Reconstructing popular perspectives: the role of political language in structuring Classical Athenian democracy.

This research project employs post-structuralist theory and techniques to examine the role that political language played in the performance and reception of radical democracy in Classical Athens. It aims to reveal and explore the, otherwise mute, perspectives that the ordinary citizens had of that democracy by analysing the extant texts of those who addressed the dēmos, the citizen body.

by virtue of the languages spoken, the Speakers who used them and the groups defined by the possession of the corresponding [linguistic] competence, the whole social structure is present in each interaction (and thereby in the discourse uttered)
