Although the organization was officially for boys, some girls joined in certain activities. In Dublin, for example, girls were allowed to participate in some activities, but not in others. The organization went by the name of the "Boys' Working-Class Club," and the girls were not allowed to join this club. However, they were allowed to join other clubs, such as the "Girls' Working-Class Club," and participate in some activities with the boys.

In 1909, however, the organization changed its name to the "Boston Working-Class Club" and expanded its activities to include both boys and girls. This change was in response to the growing number of girls who were interested in participating in the organization. The new name reflected the fact that the organization was no longer just for boys.

The organization continued to grow in popularity, and by 1910, it had over 1,000 members. Members were encouraged to join the organization, regardless of their gender, and the organization continued to provide opportunities for boys and girls to participate in a variety of activities. The organization became known for its dedication to improving the lives of working-class children and youth, and it continues to this day to provide support and resources to young people in need.
