Terms and Conditions of Use of Digitised Theses from Trinity College Library Dublin

Copyright statement

All material supplied by Trinity College Library is protected by copyright (under the Copyright and Related Rights Act, 2000 as amended) and other relevant Intellectual Property Rights. By accessing and using a Digitised Thesis from Trinity College Library you acknowledge that all Intellectual Property Rights in any Works supplied are the sole and exclusive property of the copyright and/or other IPR holder. Specific copyright holders may not be explicitly identified. Use of materials from other sources within a thesis should not be construed as a claim over them.

A non-exclusive, non-transferable licence is hereby granted to those using or reproducing, in whole or in part, the material for valid purposes, providing the copyright owners are acknowledged using the normal conventions. Where specific permission to use material is required, this is identified and such permission must be sought from the copyright holder or agency cited.

Liability statement

By using a Digitised Thesis, I accept that Trinity College Dublin bears no legal responsibility for the accuracy, legality or comprehensiveness of materials contained within the thesis, and that Trinity College Dublin accepts no liability for indirect, consequential, or incidental, damages or losses arising from use of the thesis for whatever reason. Information located in a thesis may be subject to specific use constraints, details of which may not be explicitly described. It is the responsibility of potential and actual users to be aware of such constraints and to abide by them. By making use of material from a digitised thesis, you accept these copyright and disclaimer provisions. Where it is brought to the attention of Trinity College Library that there may be a breach of copyright or other restraint, it is the policy to withdraw or take down access to a thesis while the issue is being resolved.

Access Agreement

By using a Digitised Thesis from Trinity College Library you are bound by the following Terms & Conditions. Please read them carefully.

I have read and I understand the following statement: All material supplied via a Digitised Thesis from Trinity College Library is protected by copyright and other intellectual property rights, and duplication or sale of all or part of any of a thesis is not permitted, except that material may be duplicated by you for your research use or for educational purposes in electronic or print form providing the copyright owners are acknowledged using the normal conventions. You must obtain permission for any other use. Electronic or print copies may not be offered, whether for sale or otherwise to anyone. This copy has been supplied on the understanding that it is copyright material and that no quotation from the thesis may be published without proper acknowledgement.
Politics of Cross-Cultural Reading: Three Case Studies
(Rabindranath Tagore, Tahar Ben Jelloun and Dario Fo)

Marion Dalvai

A thesis submitted to The School of Languages, Literatures and Cultural Studies at the University of Dublin, Trinity College Dublin, in fulfilment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy

September 2012
I declare that this thesis has not been submitted as an exercise for a degree at this or any other university and that it is entirely my own work.

I agree to deposit this thesis in the University's open access institutional repository or allow the Library to do so on my behalf, subject to Irish Copyright Legislation and Trinity College Library conditions of use and acknowledgement.

[Signature]

24 MÁI 2013
LIBRARY DUBLIN

Thesis 9844
Summary

The aim of this thesis is to develop a multifaceted model by which one can engage with cross-cultural acts of reading in a meaningful way and to provide a sample of quite diverse works of world literature in translation to show the model's flexibility. My methodology combines reception studies (Wolfgang Iser, Hans-Robert Jauss and Peter Rabinowitz) with polysystem theory (Itamar Even-Zohar) and rhetorical hermeneutics (Steven Mailloux). The foundations of meaning are negotiated in a complex interpretive process that involves an act of sense making (understanding) and an act of making-sense-to-others (persuading). Like meaning, authority and authenticity do not reside at one site ("the original" or "the author") but are distributed among various agents participating in the production and positioning of a literary text. The model developed in chapters 1 and 2 takes into account the text's location in its producing culture and the agents' location in theirs.

In chapters 3 to 5, I apply the model to three canonical works of world literature: Rabindranath Tagore's The Home and the World, Tahar Ben Jelloun's The Sand Child and Dario Fo's Accidental Death of an Anarchist. In each case study, I engage with specific agents, their strategies and methods of decision-making and their discursive practices as these influence the work's centrality or marginality to a canon. This particular focus increases critical awareness of the negotiations performed by agents other than the author. In the three case studies, world literature reveals itself as a field of forces, an interactive arena where cross-cultural discourse is possible, yet fundamentally shaped by agents whose politico-cultural, especially rhetorical, powers should not be underestimated. Mapping a literary text's transnational trajectory in light of the changing positions adopted by politico-cultural agents towards that particular text reveals the processual nature of all cultural transfers.

The acts of cross-cultural reading which agents perform are never disinterested: they are informed by an understanding of literature specific to a given time and place (habitus) and relate to other works of literature that form the repertoire of individual readers and reading communities alike.
Agents are also deeply connected to institutions (publishing houses, universities, theatrical traditions, but also 'schools of thought' within academia); and their acts of reading and rewriting reflect those connections. Cross-cultural acts of reading constitute a worthwhile object of investigation because they render visible the historical and physical location of all agents involved in shaping works of literature as well as accepted ideas about (world) literature in specific reading communities.

The model which I develop distinguishes itself by its wide applicability: it can serve investigations of a virtually unlimited number of texts in translation as it focuses on prominent empirical findings (para- and metatextual elements, epitexts such as interviews, newspaper reviews and academic criticism) that shed light on the preferred ways in which literature in translation is seen at particular junctions in the history of a receiving culture. Only by considering these agents and factors are we able to account for both the effect and the affect of literature in translation (the text's effect on the reader and the affective relationship of text and reader).
Acknowledgements

A Trinity Long Room Hub scholarship within the Texts, Contexts, Cultures programme provided the material security which enabled me to pursue this project to its conclusion. At the university of Dublin, I am most grateful to Peter Arnds, my supervisor, for helping me to develop my arguments, encouraging me to persist with them and accompanying the work through several drafts. Caítriona Leahy and Cormac Ó Cuileáin read and commented on an early draft of what has become the theoretical part of the thesis.

I thank Nivedita Sen (Delhi) and Sreejata Guha (Kolkata) for participating in a conversation about translation theory and practice, and Hans Harder (Heidelberg) and Habib Zanzana (Scranton) for sending me their articles on Tagore and Ben Jelloun, respectively. Sofia Jamaï (Casablanca) kindly tracked down and posted to me material from a Moroccan academic publisher.

Participants at the “Comparative Literature/World Literature” conference at Simon Fraser University, Vancouver (March 2011), “Voices in Translation” conference at the University of Copenhagen (November 2011) and the “Tagore: The Global Impact of a Writer in the Community” conference at Edinburgh Napier University (May 2012) were a receptive and informed audience. I would like to especially thank Anne Wegener and Hanne Jansen (Copenhagen) for bringing together such a vibrant group of scholars interested in voices in translation, and for their comments on my research on Fo in English.

Finally, endless thanks go to my partner, Andrew Cusack, for his unwavering support, constant encouragement and active interest in my research over the last four years. He gave generously of his time to discuss and proofread this project. He patiently listened to me, gently reminded me of the bigger picture when I risked getting lost in details and provided me with an example of the researcher I hope to be one day.
Table of Contents

Introduction: Reading world literature in English ................................................................. 3

Chapter 1: ‘The universal possession of mankind’? The discursive politics of world literature ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 7

World literature: aesthetically formed writing or an inventory of socio-cultural documents? ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 13

World literature: republic or empire? ................................................................................................................................. 17

Polysystem theory ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 22

Reception studies ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 26

Reception aesthetics ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 28

Reception history ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 35

Chapter 2: Rhetorical power and symbolic capital. The middle zone of cultural space ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 40

Cross-cultural discourse ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 41

Rhetorical hermeneutics ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 45

Politico-cultural agents: ‘invisible hands’ at work ......................................................................................... 51

Publishers ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 54

Translators, adaptors and editors as rewriters ........................................................................................................... 57

“Bad” editing? Raymond Carver and Gordon Lish ........................................................................................................... 60

Literary critics and academics ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 63

Agents made visible: paratextual and epitextual voices ......................................................................................... 68

The symbolic capital of literary prizes ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 69

Authorship and authenticity in Western thought ........................................................................................................... 72

Inventing an arch-American writer: The case of Faulkner ......................................................................................... 79

Chapter 3: At home in world literature? Rabindranath Tagore’s The Home and the World ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 83

A short-lived scandal – initial reception in India ........................................................................................................... 87

Translation and editing choices ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 91

A fragmented picture – translations and publications in English ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 95

Shifts in critical perception ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 101

Changes in literary aesthetics ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 105

Translating the ‘English’ Tagore into other European languages and cultures ..................................................... 107

Tagore in Spanish ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 108

Tagore in Portuguese ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 109

Tagore in German ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 111

Tagore in Hungarian, Slovenian and Croatian ........................................................................................................... 114

Arguing for a specific translation – paratextual engagement with authenticity ..................................................... 116

Restoring Tagore in the English-speaking West ........................................................................................................... 123

Concluding remarks: All is well that ends well? Tagore through English ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 125

Chapter 4: Tahar Ben Jelloun’s The Sand Child in English-Language Criticism ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 129

Tahar Ben Jelloun, ‘un écrivain marocain de langue française’ ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 133

The Sand Child ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 135

Document, commentary or aesthetic object? ........................................................................................................... 139

Introducing Ben Jelloun: Mortimer, Thacher, Abdalaoui and Marrouchi ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 144

Questions of gender in The Sand Child: Cavenaze and Corredor ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 148

Confessional voices: Meyer ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 152

Linking female and narrative bodies: Erickson, Simpson and Zanzana ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 153

Intertextuality and the presence of Borges: Aizenberg and Fayad ........................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................................ 158
Introduction: Reading world literature in English

English is a global language, indispensable in commercial, academic and general life. Its preeminent position is nowhere more visible than on the international publishing market: between 1979 and 2004, the share of publications written in English rose from forty to sixty percent of the world literary fiction market. However, only a small percentage of the English publications were translations.

In the English-speaking world, in fact, major publishing houses are inexplicably resistant to any kind of translated material at all. The statistics are shocking in this age of so-called globalization: in the United States and Britain, only 2 to 3 percent of books published each year are translations, compared with almost 35 percent in Latin America and Western Europe.

Although it must be acknowledged that the absolute number of translations may be higher in English than in other major literary languages, the relatively low proportion of translations in English-language publishing seems to indicate a lower degree of receptivity. On the other hand, when we look at the higher proportion of translations in major literary languages other than English, we notice the predominance of English as a source language. Clearly, some of the major literary languages are more permeable to English than the other way round. Edith Grossman explains this by saying that the “English-language market is the one most writers and their agents crave for their books.” Writers and agents are not only attracted by the profits to be made on the English-language market; they perceive translation into English as a catalyst for translation into further languages. The power and attractiveness of English-language publishing and its relative impermeability to other languages entitles us to ask: what are we reading when we read world literature – understood as literature that is not ‘one’s own’, either one’s national literature or literature written in one’s mother tongue – in English translation? The asymmetry in favour of English described above makes the exchange with literature written in languages other than English rather unbalanced.

---

Starting with these observations, my dissertation will focus on politico-cultural agents and factors that shape works of world literature in English translation. It sets out to do two things: first, to examine how literary texts undergo a series of transformations even before they reach the reading public; second, to explore how publishers, reviewers, translators and academics act as gatekeepers, including or excluding works from cultural discourse. The agents’ hermeneutical and rhetorical skills influence the way in which they mediate and translate specific texts and larger cultural systems.

While the rest of the study is concerned with the historical manifestations of specific reception processes, the first two chapters develop a multifaceted model that takes into account the text’s location in its producing culture and the agents’ location in the receiving culture. My methodology combines reception studies (Wolfgang Iser, Hans-Robert Jauss and Peter Rabinowitz) with polysystem theory (Itamar Even-Zohar) and rhetorical hermeneutics (Steven Mailloux). The foundations of meaning, I contend, are not exclusively to be found in the text (as a material object) or in language (as an abstract concept) but they are negotiated in a complex interpretive process that involves an act of sense making (understanding) as well as an act of making-sense-to-others (persuading). Like meaning, authority and authenticity do not reside at one site (‘the original’ or ‘the author’) but are distributed among various agents participating in the production and positioning of a literary text.

Chapter 1 briefly outlines the emergence and persistence of the term ‘world literature.’ I engage in more detail with the discursive politics visible in Pascale Casanova’s definition of ‘world literature’ as autonomous field of production before moving on to an alternative model of literature, polysystem theory. Finally, I introduce the two main strands of reception studies, reception aesthetics and reception history.

Chapter 2 introduces the third and final essential element to my model, rhetorical hermeneutics, and engages more deeply with the agents who shape texts in translation (publishers, translators, adaptors, editors, literary critics and academics) before moving on to a discussion of the importance of literary prizes for the contemporary international book market. As a final point, I briefly outline two central concepts that emerge in all discussions of translated texts: authorship and authenticity.

In chapters 3 to 5, I apply the model developed in chapters 1 and 2 to three works translated into English that are commonly described and promoted as 'world literature': The Home and the World by Rabindranath Tagore (1861-1941), The Sand Child by Tahar Ben Jelloun (born in 1944) and Accidental Death of an Anarchist by Dario Fo (born in 1926). In each case study, I engage with several agents responsible for the way in which the text is presented to the English-speaking readership, their strategies and methods of decision-making and their discursive practices. My focus varies in each case study in order to show the versatility of my model which can be applied either to give a bird's-eye view of the reception of a literary work over a relatively prolonged period of time (Tagore), or to 'zoom in' on one particularly insightful aspect of reception, such as the academic criticism on a specific work (Ben Jelloun) or the paratextual and metatextual commentary provided by agents other than the author within the covers of a published text (Fo).

Chapter 3 reconstructs the complex reception history of Rabindranath Tagore's novel The Home and the World in the English-speaking West. The first Asian writer to receive the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1913, Tagore was reduced to a marginal figure in the English-speaking West by 1960. I analyze the reasons for the decline in Tagore's literary reputation and then proceed to agents and factors responsible for the reintroduction of Tagore into the canon of world literature in its English implementation over the last thirty years.

Chapter 4 focuses on a single aspect of the reception of Tahar Ben Jelloun's 1985 novel The Sand Child: academic criticism written in English.
The chapter concentrates on specific readings of Ben Jelloun's novel as well as on the cross-fertilization between individual critical readings and between critical discourses across cultures. Establishing which lines of argument are accepted as meaningful and which arguments put forward in French are acknowledged or adopted in English Ben Jelloun criticism allows one to discuss why claims of a professedly disinterested engagement with literature, on the one hand, and the location of academics within specific institutions and the wider academic field, on the other, are often at variance.

Chapter 5 concentrates on the paratextual and metatextual commentary provided by editors, translators and adaptors of English-language versions of Dario Fo's Accidental Death of an Anarchist. I flesh out the specific translation and adaptation strategies, and link these to the wider politics at work in the transposition of theatre texts and theatrical traditions.

The conclusion argues that, when dealing with works of world literature in translation, we need to take into account a text's transnational trajectory and the changing positions of politico-cultural agents towards that particular text, in short, we need to acknowledge the processual nature of all cultural transfers in order to be able to do justice to both the effect and affect of literature in translation (the text's effect on the reader and the affective relationship of text and reader).
Chapter 1: 'The universal possession of mankind'? The discursive politics of world literature

During the eighteenth century, literary magazines and collections published in cultural centres across Europe provided a growing reading public with more and more translations, not only of Greek and Latin classics but also from other (mainly, but not exclusively, European) languages. Over the decades, they contributed to the "eventual development and confirmation of a corpus of classic fiction (presented in, for example, many nineteenth-century collected editions) that would include foreign works in translation." As Gillespie argues, this intensification of literary translation actually enabled the establishment of a separate English literary canon over and against the classics ("Translation and Canon Formation," 7–8). In other European countries the canon was expanding along similar lines, integrating translations of modern European works and non-European literature. In Germany, book production expanded by fifty percent between 1750 and 1800 and steadily grew in the nineteenth century, more than tripling in the twenty-five years between 1820 and 1845 to over 14,000 titles per annum, thanks to Friedrich Koenig's high-speed press and the advent of the steam engine. Many of these books were translations. It is no coincidence that Johann Wolfgang von Goethe proffered his widely quoted sentence about world literature after a long life of reading translations from dozens of languages and after a recent, intense engagement with translations from the Chinese: "National literature is now a rather unmeaning term; the epoch of world literature is at hand, and everyone must strive to hasten its approach." There is more to Goethe's call for a new era in literature than a sudden realization that literature can be a window onto the world or, indeed, facile universalism. In an address written for a scientific conference in Berlin in 1828, Goethe wrote the following:

If we have dared to proclaim a European, indeed a general world literature, then this is not to say that the different nations take notice of each other and their productions, for in this sense such a literature has long existed, continues and more or less renews itself. No! What is at stake here is rather that the living and striving literators come to know each other and feel moved, by inclination and a sense of community, to work together.⁴

Here, Goethe argues for the creation of an ideal community that will further specific modes of literary circulation and cross-fertilization, thus shifting the focus towards the production and producers of literature. If Goethe argues for an ideal community of literateurs, I am interested in the actual modes of cross-cultural circulation of literary texts as well as the politico-cultural role played by agents besides the author (translators, editors, publishers, reviewers, critics and academics) in these processes.

The term politics, Jacques Rancière points out, is often equated with the exercise of power. Yet, the simple existence of power structures or of regulatory laws is not enough for power to be exercised: “What is needed is a configuration of a specific form of community. Politics is the construction of a specific sphere of experience in which certain objects as posited as shared and certain subjects regarded as capable of designating these objects and of arguing about them.”⁵ In the context of cross-cultural reading, therefore, politics refers to 1) the sphere of experience shared by readers in the receiving culture, 2) strategies and methods of decision-making processes within specific reading communities, as well as 3) the discursive practices that follow from these decisions. While politics shapes every single reading process, it becomes more visible in the reading of translations as this type of reading has to negotiate various degrees of foreignness that in turn bring to the fore quite specific interpretive and discursive strategies.

---

Reception historians investigate a series of visible factors that shape the reception of literary works. For first time publications, they record the reasons why a work is selected for publication in the first place, how it is transformed (through various forms of rewriting, such as editing and adaptation), what impact the text has on the literary elite (literary critics, academics, journalists) and on the general reading public (numbers of copies sold and inclusion in book club discussions, for example). Literary texts might also enter cultural and social discourse on several levels: they become part of school and university curriculums and might be included in literary histories and anthologies. Works of literature sometimes have an intermedial effect (film adaptations, radio plays or even computer games) and they might be discussed in a variety of forums (newspapers, television shows or literature blogs). Finally, they influence other literary texts; and—if they are innovatory rather than conservative—might also change poetic and aesthetic categories. All of these manifestations of reception are palpable and help the literary critic interested in reception history to gain a more complete overview of the impact that a literary work has not only on the literary field, but also on the cultural field in general at a given time in history. If there is an absence of these visible factors, if a text has no or little impact on the larger culture it is (being) embedded in, this might be an indication of a text not fitting the politico-cultural agenda of that particular time and place (especially if this text is 'redeemed' later on or in a different cultural system through translation). The reception history of translated works of literature consists of all the factors mentioned above with the addition of a further level of analysis, that of one or several translations of the literary text available in the receiving culture.\(^7\)

---

6 Reception processes "become manifest in a wide variety of forms: in the selection and transformation of the works, the attention given to them by publishers, reviewers, essayists and academics, the reactions of the buying and reading public, their modes of entry into cultural discourse, their inclusion in literary histories and schoolbooks, their intertextual and intermedial transmission, and in their influence on poetics and even on social thought." Els Andringa, "For God's and Virginia's Sake Why a Translation?"-Virginia Woolf's Transfer to the Low Countries," Comparative Critical Studies 3, no. 3 (2006): 201-26. Here 201.

At any given moment in time, there exist a variety of communities engaged with (world) literature, whether we conceive of them in very real terms (university literature classes, book clubs) or in a more abstract sense (the 'British' or 'Western' readership).\(^8\) Reading communities develop what Jonathan Culler calls specific kinds of literary competence, i.e. they "internalize the 'grammar' of literature which permits [them] to convert linguistic sequences into literary structures and meanings."\(^9\) Culler argues that we make sense of a literary work following an established set of rules of whose existence we are more or less aware, and he suggests that these rules are the result of a negotiation between past and present culture. The rules of interpretation do, of course, change from culture to culture and from one historical period to another; thus a text is never approached without specific preconceptions and assumptions.\(^10\) The rules of interpretation described here form a habitus in the sense defined by Bourdieu: "both a system of schemata of production of practices and a system of perception and appreciation of practices."\(^11\) However, Culler does not clearly address the issue of how readers internalize the 'grammar' of literary structures and

\(^7\) Translation is, in fact, a major form of rewriting a text. See André Lefevere, "Why Waste Our Time on Rewrites? The Trouble with Interpretation and the Role of Rewriting in an Alternative Paradigm," in The Manipulation of Literature, ed. Theo Hermans (London and Sydney: Croom Helm, 1985), 215-43. Lefevere advocates that "[t]ranslation can no longer be analysed in isolation but it should be studied as part of a whole system of texts and the people who produce, support, propagate, oppose, censor them" (237).

\(^8\) These communities are not Stanley Fish's interpretive communities, however. Fish's 'affective stylistics' is based on the assumption that it is the reader that invests a text with all of its meaning. Each reader is part of an interpretive community and reads, or rather writes a text, according to established and well-accepted rules within this community. Fish defines interpretive communities as "made up of those who share interpretive strategies not for reading (in the conventional sense) but for writing texts, for constituting their properties and assigning their intentions. In other words, these strategies exist prior to the act of reading and therefore determine the shape of what is read rather than, as is usually assumed, the other way around." Stanley Eugene Fish, "Interpreting the Variorum," in The Book History Reader, ed. David Finkelstein and Alistair McCleery (London and New York: Routledge, 2006), 450-58. Here 451.

meanings or how this literary grammar relates to other modes of being and understanding. We shall return to this issue in chapter 2.\textsuperscript{12}

Within such a community of readers, some agents will possess more discursive authority than others. Discursive authority is the ability to make other members in the shared sphere of experience conceive of a given object in one's preferred way. It also entails the ability to neutralize or render ineffective critics who question one's interpretation. All analysis of discursive practices must focus on the two dimensions of discursive authority: the discursive (what is said) and the performative (how it is said and in what setting).\textsuperscript{13} "Community" here is a performative discourse in the sense described by Homi Bhabha: "As a category, community enables a division between the private and the public, the civil and the familial; but as a performative discourse it enacts the impossibility of drawing an objective line between the two."\textsuperscript{14} In chapters 3 to 5, I will analyse a sequence of rhetorical performances in which various agents invested with discursive authority produce and assign meaning and status to a particular work of literature and its author. But let us return to the discursive politics that surround the term 'world literature.'

The term that Goethe coined, 'Weltliteratur,' was the expression of a new cultural awareness and literary perspective developing in the nineteenth century that was also linked to budding modern forms of capitalism in the West.\textsuperscript{15} Yet, far from Imperialist projects that later comparatists such as \textsuperscript{12} The influence of French Structuralism is apparent in Culler's choice of words. The concept of a \textit{sign system} with a clear \textit{grammar} that readers internalize is undoubtedly indebted to thinkers such as Lévi-Strauss, Foucault, Todorov and Barthes.

\textsuperscript{13} 'Discursive authority' is a term often used when speaking about public policy. For one example of its use, see Maarten Hajer and David Laws, "Policy in Practice," in \textit{The Oxford Handbook of Public Policy}, ed. Michael Moran, Martin Rein, and Robert E. Goodin (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2006), 409-25.

\textsuperscript{14} Homi K. Bhabha, \textit{The Location of Culture} (London: Routledge, 1994), 235.

\textsuperscript{15} The uniqueness of European culture has too often been explained by linking it to the uniqueness of the system of capitalism developed there. However, several historians are now revising this European 'exclusivity claim' to capitalism. John Goody argues that capitalism is not a uniquely European phenomenon or indeed the all-defining moment in modern history: "Capitalism in a general sense, as Braudel suggests, was not the invention of one country or of one area, [...] it was an aspect of the merchant economies that grew up with the Bronze Age, and even before. Once this has been recognized, the whole issue of the European (or even the English) miracle takes on a different form, as an aspect of interacting economies. Gone is the presumed advantage of antiquity, of feudalism, of capitalism, which supposedly characterized the West. [...] The West was, of course privileged by the dramatic upheaval that occurred in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.
Macaulay would advocate, Goethe's project situates itself in the idealist, humanist tradition. Goethe believed that in the future an open dialogue would happen between nations (understood, in Herder's sense, as cultural and linguistic communities, each characterized by a specific Volksgeist). Understanding between cultures would increase, also thanks to more foreign literature being made available to readers in translation. Goethe saw 'Weltliteratur' as an opportunity for greater understanding rather than for the imposition of cultural hegemony. However, his endeavour does not reduce the indeterminacy of the two words making up the term 'world literature.'

The 'world' in 'world literature' can be understood in at least three ways: as a unifying principle of universality underpinning all human endeavour; it might refer to a (perceived) linear tradition that has formed the Western mind and therefore consists of a relatively limited number of 'Great Books' or it might mean global or planetary in a more postcolonial fashion. Similarly, the term 'literature' is mostly understood in a strict Eurocentric manner, in one of two ways: literature as belles lettres, aesthetically formed writing which aims to cultivate taste and which, for a long time, relied on a high degree of emulation of the classics; or, with the advent of literary history, literature as "condensed, and indeed exemplary, bodies of social and cultural documentation" (Hoesel-Uhlig, "Changing Fields," 47).
World literature: aesthetically formed writing or an inventory of socio-cultural documents?

Pascale Casanova claims that the initial step towards an international literary space came with the formation of the first European states in the sixteenth century. The intellectual struggle for the recognition of vernacular literature over and against Latin sees its first culmination in the French Pléiade and du Bellay’s La deffence et illustration de la langue françoysse in 1549. The second step saw the (re)invention of self-consciously national languages in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, while the third and last stage was decolonization. Casanova also provides a chronology of when various members joined the international literary space:

Previously confined to regional areas that were sealed off from each other, literature now emerged as a common battleground. Renaissance Italy, fortified by its Latin heritage, was the first recognized literary power. Next came France, with the rise of the Pléiade in the mid-sixteenth century, which in challenging both the hegemony of Latin and the advance of Italian produced a first tentative sketch of transnational literary space. Then Spain and England, followed by the rest of the countries of Europe, gradually entered into competition on the strength of their own literary “assets” and traditions. The nationalist movements that appeared in central Europe during the nineteenth century – a century that also saw the arrival of North America and Latin America on the international literary scene – generated new claims to literary existence. Finally, with decolonization, countries in Africa, the Indian subcontinent, and Asia demanded access to literary legitimacy and existence as well. (World Republic, 11)

Casanova’s discursive practice is tainted by eurocentricity. Not only is the chronology advocated here doubtful: where, for example, do we insert Indian and Chinese literature written before decolonization? Was there no exchange between cultures inside and outside Europe before the sixteenth century? What are the confines of Europe? And most importantly, are literary assets and traditions only ever assets of written language and traditions of aesthetically formed ways of writing? Here, literature is the perfect apolitical space in which literary genius and talent are automatically recognized, and the only currency is aesthetic value. There seems to be no need to distinguish 'literature' from 'world literature' in this universe, as truly important works will be recognized as such and will be automatically included in the canon, irrespective of their origins.

The second definition of literature as an archive or inventory of sociocultural documents waiting to be studied is equally Eurocentric. The underlying suggestion is that cultural comparison through literature is in fact objective. Goethe claimed that "poetry is the universal possession of mankind, revealing itself everywhere and at all times in hundreds and hundreds of men" (Goethe, Conversations, 133). "Poetry," here, stands for language: similarly to Herder, Goethe believed that all human beings used language to express themselves. In what was perceived as a logical deduction from this claim, many thinkers argued that as poetry (and, by extension, literature) truly was the universal possession of mankind, it could be objectively compared, judged and valued. This claim to objectivity works on several levels: on an aesthetic level, Kant's postulate of pure and disinterested aesthetics functions as a guarantor of objective universality. On an epistemological level, the possibility of knowledge of other cultures, the ability to absorb their literature is never doubted: the appropriate application of methods of abstraction will result in the correct interpretation. The methods of hermeneutic interpretation adopted, however, are again Eurocentric in character: the books of the Great Tradition are established as models against which newcomers from other cultures have to measure up in terms of content, genre, style and literariness. Ultimately, the adoption of these literary standards influences one facet of what Thomas Richards has

---

19 World fiction might be a better term that allows us to include acts of literature that do not fit the narrow definition of belles lettres as fine writing, valued for its aesthetic qualities, style and tone, as an end in itself. Thus, when I use the term literature in what follows, it is out of necessity and with a heightened awareness of the flaws in the terminology that excludes more than it includes.

20 Immanuel Kant, Critique of Judgment, transl. Nicholas Walker (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007). Kant describes four key features of aesthetic judgments: they are disinterested (we take pleasure in an object because we judge it beautiful, rather than finding it beautiful because we see it as pleasurable); they are universal (we expect others to agree with our judgment); they are necessary, and 'purposive without purpose' (beautiful objects affect us as though they had a specific purpose, although they do not).
called the imperial archive, "a fantasy of knowledge collected and united in the service of state and Empire."\(^{21}\)

While literature is understood more and more as an archive, the aesthetic component that had shaped the previous understanding of literature as belles lettres continues to be present, if only in enfeebled form as genre poetics loses its binding quality. As a result, "the [...] archival endorsement [of the term 'world literature'] invites an ever wider range of readings, while its weak aesthetic impulse suggests more selection" (Hoesel-Uhlig, "Changing Fields," 32-33). Two conflicting views of world literature emerge: world literature should include more (no less than the entire world!); yet it should also only include 'good' literature or masterpieces (however defined). This unsolvable tension is also visible in twentieth century discussions about canons of (world) literature.

On one hand, we have a school of thought that sees literature as a perfect ahistorical and apolitical space. Examples range from T.S. Eliot's definition of the 'classics' as an imagined, utopian corpus of great works that comes together thanks to an epistemological master pattern of excellence to Harold Bloom who argues against the politicization of literature and presents a guide to the twenty-six essential writers of the ages that have shaped the Western canon.\(^{22}\) On the other hand, we have a variety of different voices (Feminist, New Historicist, Marxist and Postcolonial) arguing the importance of analysing the position of literature and literary agents within specific power structures, thus shifting the focus from the text to the context of production and reception: canons of (world) literature are always closely linked to specific power structures, and literary works do in fact represent the 'reality' that bore them.\(^{23}\) Deconstruction stands somewhat aside from all other approaches to literature, as it is sceptical as to the possibility of coherent meaning, an author's intention or the text's representation of 'reality.' A rapprochement among the different stances on the nature of literature is not in sight.

As will emerge most clearly in the case study of Tahar Ben Jelloun in chapter 4, several literary critics who believe that literature has a mainly documentary function read literary texts as authentic representations of a given reality or culture. In this approach, literary texts are not perceived to be very different from historical, sociological and ethnographic documents: they allow us to gain a better understanding of a clearly defined 'other.' However, as Wolfgang Riedel points out, there is a danger in equating literary texts with the culture they are thought to represent, as this stance tends to neglect the aesthetic component of literature and therefore fails to acknowledge that literature is in fact a discourse quite different from history, sociology or ethnography. Riedel argues that a literary text is not a document but rather a commentary on the culture and reality it stems from, written from an aesthetic and reflective distance. The concept of commentary is a useful tool in world literature as it allows one to relativize the idea that the main value of literary texts in translation from different cultures is to provide privileged knowledge of that culture.

Since the 1970s, more non-Western critical voices have participated in the constitution and interpretation of world literature; as a consequence, world literature syllabuses in colleges worldwide have changed considerably.
While we are far from a balanced understanding of what world literature is or should be, the developments of the past few decades seem positive overall.
The (sometimes heated) discussions about canonisation and what constitutes 'classics' of literature, about the cultural politics at work in literary centres in the West and in the so-called periphery, and about the value of translation have shown that, while far from perfect, a critical engagement with

---

_Literature in an Age of Globalization_, ed. Haun Saussy (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University

²⁴ See Wolfgang Riedel, "Literarische Anthropologie: Eine Unterscheidung," in _Wahrnehmen
und Handeln: Perspektiven einer Literaturanthropologie_, ed. Wolfgang Braungart, Klaus Ridder, and Friedmar Apel (Bielefeld, Germany: Aisthesis, 2004), 337-86, esp. 350-52. In the German context, 'anthropology' is understood as a philosophical discourse (the theory of man) rather than the common English-language notion of 'ethnography.'
the concept of world literature is still necessary and fruitful. In any discussion of this kind, I contend, one needs to account for both the idealizing aims of a project such as world literature and the politicized results of this project. A recent example of how to idealize literary space is Casanova’s World Republic of Letters, which I have already briefly mentioned above. In the following section, I will engage with her ideas in lieu of many similar theories that advocate the autonomy of literature before proposing an alternative, heteronomous model of literature.

World literature: republic or empire?

Casanova bases her study on Bourdieu’s theory of the autonomous literary field when she defines the world republic of letters as “a literary universe relatively independent of the everyday world and its political divisions, whose boundaries and operational laws are not reducible to those of ordinary political space” (World Republic, xii). The second central theoretical term for Casanova is Braudel’s concept of the ‘economy-world’ (économie-monde) which she uses to argue for the existence of a ‘literature world’ alongside the historical, economic and political realms that is only partly, if at all, dependent upon these realities. Braudel defines the economy-world as a space that changes slowly, has at its centre a dominant capitalist metropolis, and different hierarchically layered zones. Casanova conceives of the literary universe in very similar terms: a dimension that functions according to a different timescale and where long-term cycles only slowly supersede one another, with several important literary capitals (most importantly Paris, then London and New York) and clearly divided into central and peripheral zones.

*For a substantial part of her study, Casanova simplifies Bourdieu’s model, focusing mainly on the autonomous nature of the literary field but neglecting to mention that Bourdieu’s model actually constructs a double hierarchy. When it comes to success on the literary or cultural market, Bourdieu sees the literary and cultural fields as heteronomous (i.e. interdependent with social, economic and political spheres of life). It is only where consecration (intended as the field-specific application of criteria of value) is concerned that the literary and cultural fields have gained a relatively high degree of independence from the social, economic or political domains. Also, contrary to Bourdieu who analyzes well-defined literary and cultural fields firmly located in time and space, Casanova sees the whole transnational space of world literature as a single literary field which functions according to well-established rules. Ultimately, however, Casanova is forced to acknowledge the double hierarchy described by Bourdieu: "to one degree or another, [...] literary relations of power are forms of political relations of power" (World Republic, 81).*

According to this model, literary texts only have one way of entering the canon: consecration in one of the capitals of the literary universe.

The consecration of a text is the almost magical metamorphosis of an ordinary material into "gold," into absolute literary value. In this sense the sanctioning authorities of world literary space are the guardians, guarantors, and creators of value, which is nonetheless always changing, ceaselessly contested and debated, by virtue of the very fact of its connection with the literary present and modernity. (Casanova, World Republic, 126-27)

There is an unsolved tension in this concept of consecration. On the one hand, the sanctioning authorities in the world republic of letters are supposed to bestow "absolute literary value" (which results from the different temporality that supposedly regulates the literary universe). On the other hand, value is constantly contested and debated. The same tension between the absolute distinctness of literature and its relative connectedness to societal, political and economic dimensions exists throughout Casanova's study. Casanova's model is also inherently metropolitan and thus brushes over literary consecration that happens outside cities in general and Western cities in particular. Because the institutions and arbiters that assign littérarité are all located at the centres of power in world literary space, literature turns out to be uniformly embedded in a singular market, a simple temporality, and tied puppet-like to a singular spatiality of which only the centres ultimately determine the standards of literary excellence. [...] Literary innovation and aesthetic breakthroughs can take place in peripheral locations of world literary space. But only when those innovations are recognized as quintessentially literary or aesthetic by the requisite authorities do they become such. There is no literature then (or no literature worthy of the title), Casanova seems to be suggesting, unless it is a part of, self-consciously located within, and recognized by the institutions of world literary space. The pattern that thus emerges in her analysis is that of a mirroring hegemon rooted in the centres of the literary world market, reflecting to world literary space as a whole those features of the dominated zones that most appeal to it.27

In an autonomous literary universe of this kind, works only become ‘worldly’ and ‘literary’ if they correspond to an extremely narrow concept of literariness, as understood in the literary capital(s). Casanova seems to advocate innovation and modernity as the all-important defining element of literariness. But who decides what is innovative and modern? “[I]t is necessary to be old in order to have any chance of being modern or of decreeing what is modern. In other words, having a long national past is the condition of being able to claim a literary existence that is fully recognized in the present” (World Republic, 89-90). By linking the ‘age’ of a culture to a clearly Eurocentric concept, that of the nation of the post-Napoleonic times, Casanova ignores the existence of many de facto older civilizations, that achieved literary modernity without relying on a strong national past in the terms advocated by her. Bengal, for example, can look back onto a rich literary existence that stretches back to at least the ninth century CE and therefore clearly should qualify as ‘old.’ It also saw a literary revolution, the Bengali Renaissance, characterized by innovation and modernization. More importantly, though, making literary consecration solely dependent on evaluations in the literary capitals bears considerable risks of propagating Eurocentric standards of excellence ad infinitum. According to Casanova, it is the centrality of Paris and London, and of French and English respectively, that motivated Nabokov’s decision to write in languages other than his native Russian as he wished to attain “genuine literary existence and recognition.” Casanova literally claims that Nabokov “had to ‘carry over’ his work into one of the two great literary languages he knew” (Casanova, World Republic, 140). Here, Casanova suggests that Russian was not (or should not be) considered an established literary language or at least not on a par with French or English.

---

28 The and oldest manuscript of Charyapada, the first known Bengali written language, is a collection of poems written between the ninth the eleventh century. The palm leaf manuscript consists of 47 verses, written by over twenty poets that describe “agriculture and particularly the importance of family, marriage and local ways.” Amaresh Datta, The Encyclopaedia of Indian Literature, Volume One: A to Devo, (New Delhi: Sahitya Akademi, 2006), 647. On the Bengali Renaissance, see Subrata Dasgupta, The Bengal Renaissance: Identity and Creativity from Rammohun Roy to Rabindranath Tagore (Delhi: Permanent Black, 2007).
One of the writers that Casanova treats is Rabindranath Tagore, who is also at the centre of chapter 3. Tagore was fifty-one years old when he was introduced to the literary scene in London in 1912. The London literary elite was fascinated by this 'sage from the Orient,' and, thanks to the endorsement of some of its leading members (Robert Bridges, Sturge Moore, Ezra Pound and William Butler Yeats), Tagore was the first Asian writer to be awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1913. Casanova argues that Tagore needed consecration in the West in order to be included in the canon of world literature, glossing over the fact that Tagore was established as a literary giant in Bengal and India before he was 'consecrated' in London. Granted, the initial success in London and the subsequent Nobel Prize did make Tagore a more visible figure on the Western literary scene for a while – yet world literary space, I contend, cannot simply be reduced to visibility or marketability in the West. While Tagore’s works were unavailable in the English-speaking West for several decades, during that time they remained visible in India, other European countries and in the Middle East (all undoubtedly members of the international literary space). Examples such as this prove that we need another, less uniform model of literature that allows for several parallel canons and co-existing transnational networks of literary interaction to exist at the same time and that does not attempt to subsume all phenomena under the same heading.

By criticizing Casanova’s claim of autonomy, I am by no means advocating an exact equivalence between the literary world and the political, economic and historical dimensions of life. Rather, I argue for a definition of literature as heteronomous system. If literature were truly autonomous, it would have to work within a distinctly different system of power relations. Yet, when Casanova describes the power relations between centres and peripheries, they seem not very different from power struggles in the political and historical arenas. Ultimately, Casanova is forced to admit that “to one degree or another, [...] literary relations of power are forms of political relations of power” (81). The concept of a literary marketplace is extremely useful, yet I contend that it needs to be complemented by focusing on a variety of other – politico-cultural and sociological - factors that I will elaborate on in more detail throughout the dissertation. Ultimately, Casanova presents a prescriptive view of literature: she describes an "empire more than a republic," as Perry Anderson remarks in his review.⁵⁹

There is also a need to redress Casanova's assumption that literary history and reception history are hindering a more complete understanding of the crucial role that translators and critics play in the act of consecration:

Since historians of literature restrict themselves—to simplify somewhat—to examining the particular (and typically dehistoricized) history of an individual author, or giving a general account of the development of a national literature, or else reviewing the history of the different interpretations ("readings") of a given text over time, the process of consecration and litérisation—authorized by critics and carried out by translators—is always passed over in silence, forgotten or simply ignored. (Casanova, World Republic, 142)

Here, Casanova ends up judging and pushing aside a whole discipline such as literary history. While it is true that critics and translators play a very important role that has too often been neglected, it would make more sense to discuss how these issues can be integrated into projects of literary history. As far as the criticism of reception history goes, not only does reception history not simply ignore the consecration process, it actually documents it in all its subtlety, focusing on a multitude of agents and factors that influence how a literary work is received on the (world) literary market at a determinate point in time and space.

As an alternative to Casanova's model, I would therefore like to use and adapt Itamar Even-Zohar's polysystem theory, an explanatory model for general cultural phenomena with a special focus on literature. While polysystem theory has been and is still widely used in translation studies, this is not the case in comparative literature. Here, Pierre Bourdieu's theory of the literary field and Niklas Luhmann's systems theory seem to have attracted more followers.⁶⁰ In the following section, I explain Even-Zohar's model and illustrate its usefulness for this study as well as for other projects interested in reception processes.

⁶⁰ "[T]o some extent, this is due to the misconception that the more recent forms of system theory have superseded their polysystemic predecessor." Philippe Codde, "Polysystem Theory Revisited: A New Comparative Introduction," Poetics Today 24, no. 1 (2003): 91-126. Here 91.

Polysystem theory

Starting from the assumption that human society is always stratified, Even-Zohar sets out to elaborate a theory that would account not only for what we usually call 'reality,' but also for different expressions of human thought: history, philosophy, sociology and literature. Any semiotic polysystem, be it history, language or literature, is a part of a larger polysystem, that of 'culture' and thus closely related to the whole and the other components of this larger polysystem. "Conceiving of literature as a separate semi-independent socio-cultural institution is therefore tenable only if the literary polysystem, like any other socio-cultural system, is conceived of as simultaneously autonomous and heteronomous with all other co-systems." The idea that polysystems possess some autonomy but are still related to a larger ensemble allows us to treat literature in its entire complexity and to address the paradoxical situation of its constantly shifting boundaries. Even-Zohar's approach is pragmatic and functional: it is based on the analysis of relations within and between different semiotic systems. Polysystem theory also provides a less simplistic and reductive approach to the question as to why readers read the way they do and why we can achieve some sort of consensus in interpretation, as well as a workable model for literature's interrelations with other discourses, as we shall see throughout this dissertation.

Rather than rejecting the totality of Structuralism as static and synchronic, Even-Zohar argues that there is a dynamic approach already embedded in the historical aspects of Russian Formalism and Czech Structuralism. If one wants to describe how a system functions both in principle and in time, one soon realizes that "a system consists of both

---

32 See Gerald Ernest Paul Gillespie, By Way of Comparison: Reflections on the Theory and Practice of Comparative Literature (Paris: Champion, 2004), 228: "The advantage of general systems thinking is that it does not first require that a particular literature or set of literatures serve the individual scholar as the exclusive source of standards on which to base his or her conclusions or to perceive others’ truth-claims. Rather, it allows the researcher to situate literary works in relation to the significant movements of elements in the repertory of any literature, including phenomena that exhibit intersystemic interferences, such as translation."
synchrony and diachrony" ("Polysystem Theory," 11) and that it is by definition heterogeneous and open, and that its elements are interdependent. In polysystem theory, heterogeneity is reconcilable with functionality because, rather than correlating them individually, Even-Zohar conceives of individual items or functions as constitutive of "partly alternative systems of concurrent options" (13). These systems are structured, they are indeed hierarchies, and there is a permanent struggle between the various strata, a constant change between centrifugal and centripetal motions. In a literary polysystem, the centre could be equated with dominant literary models or, indeed, an established canon of 'great books.' The movement towards and away from the centre explains why at a specific time in history a particular literary genre or author gains importance, thus moving towards the centre, or why it is slipping into oblivion, moving away from the centre.33

Every polysystem, however, does not only have one centre (standard language, canonized literature) and one periphery (everything that is not in the centre) but many parallel centres and peripheries. Also, elements might move not only within a polysystem (from one stratum to another) but also from one system into an adjacent system. Thus, an influential philosophical text will have an impact on the writing of literature and history, and developments in literature might influence other discourses. This holds true for the relationship between fiction and extraliterary reality, as well. Polysystem theory also offers a viable model for cross-cultural discourse in the way it describes the transfers within a system but especially between systems. I will repeatedly come back to the question as to why cross-cultural transfers take place in the first place and how these transfers are performed and actualized.

Ultimately, Even-Zohar suggests, all polsysterns are conceived of as a component of a 'mega-polysystem,' one that organizes and controls several polysystems. However, polysystems are not clear-cut or forever bound to one specific form. Because of this, "the very notions of ‘within’ and ‘between’ cannot be taken either statically or for granted" (24). One of the prerequisites for any socio-cultural system to operate is heterogeneity. In polysystem theory, the law of proliferation not only seems to be _universally valid_ but _necessary_. "In order to fulfil its needs, a system actually strives to avail itself of a growing inventory of alternative options" (26). In most literary polysystems there is a conscious lookout for new talent, new voices, new forms of literature, either from within or from other polysystems. Ultimately, the adoption of polysystem theory provides us with a tool to explain changing interpretations of literature as well as literature’s relations to other discourses and cultures (polysystems in their own right) as well as its relations to ‘reality’ (the ‘mega-polysystem’).

33 Clearly, this centre is not a geographically definable centre, such as the Paris or London the literary universe as conceived by Casanova in The World Republic of Letters.

One of the central notions in polysystem theory is that of the _repertoire_, “the aggregate of rules and materials which govern both the _making_ and _handling_, or production and consumption of any given product.”

The two levels described here (individual objects or elements and the rules or models they either reflect or labour against) always are at work in the transfer of literary texts from one cultural polysystem to another. Most importantly, however, the term _repertoire_ has connotations of a certain freedom of choice. Thus, the interpretation options available to members of reading communities will, of course, be culturally determined but members can actively choose from a variety of options available to them. The concept of repertoire allows for different coexisting viewpoints of literature: readers may opt to view literature as authentic documents that one can use as a socio-anthropological representation of a given culture or period in history, or rather see these as commentary (in Riedel’s sense) or, at the other end of the spectrum, as an autonomous aesthetic exercise that is not necessarily related to ‘reality’ as such.

Over the years, Even-Zohar has amended and expanded his model several times, also adapting Jakobson’s Communication Scheme to deal with socio-semiotic polysystems in general and literary polysystems in particular. Even-Zohar explains the adapted scheme as follows:

---

A CONSUMER may “consume” a PRODUCT produced by a PRODUCER, but in order for the “product” to be generated, then properly consumed, a common REPERTOIRE must exist, whose usability is constrained, determined, or controlled by some INSTITUTION on the one hand, and a MARKET where such a good can be transmitted, on the other. (“Factors and Dependencies,” 20)

The scheme is easily applied to any act of reading literature: a reader (consumer) sitting somewhere in Britain picks up a book by, let us say, Charles Dickens (producer). In order for a ‘successful’ reading to happen, the reader must share a certain repertoire (common language, specific ideas about what a novel is or how characters are/should be described) with the author. Dickens’ œuvre, however, is determined/constrained/controlled by, for example, a long tradition of Dickens scholarship and editing (part of Even-Zohar’s institution, “the aggregate of factors involved with the control of culture”) of which the reader might or might not be aware. The reader is also influenced by his or her own schooling (another element of institution) and can only access reading material that is available on the market (which, quite like the institution, is defined as an intermediary force “between social forces and culture repertoires,” 20). The usefulness of this scheme for revealing points of friction in the reading of translations is apparent: what happens when we place other producers next to the author (editor, translator, adaptor)? What if the repertoire available to the reader does not necessarily correspond to the repertoire of the author? How will the co-producers of the translated text make sure that the text fits into what they perceive to be the repertoire of the receiving culture?

As far as my own research is concerned, thinking of works of world literature in translation as objects positioned within a flexible, multilayered polysystem allows me to investigate different aspects: the struggle between high and low culture, the tension between centre and periphery, as well as claims of equivalence between original and translated texts. While Even-Zohar is mainly interested in literary models, my focus is different: as pointed out above, I concentrate on agents besides the author who shape the production and reception of translated works of world literature in specific receiving cultures. In the following section, I provide an overview of the major concepts of reception studies, another of the three theories that provide the foundation of my method besides Even-Zohar's polysystem theory and Steven Mailloux's rhetorical hermeneutics (to be described in chapter 2).

Reception studies

It is the joint effort of author and reader which brings upon the scene that concrete and imaginary object which is the work of the mind. There is no art except for and by others.

The study of reception has been one of the dominant modes of literary criticism since the 1970s. Starting out in the Constance School with Wolfgang Iser and Hans-Robert Jauss, reception theories have been gaining importance globally since the 1980s. Rather than conceiving of the literary text in terms inspired by Romanticism that conceives of the author as a genius communicating his ideas to a passive reader, with the text seen as a simple vehicle of communication or, alternatively, as an independent, integrated, unified work of art in which all the necessary information is enclosed, typical of text-centred criticism, reception studies has got two main foci: it analyzes modes of interpretations and the act of reading (aesthetics of reception) and it approaches literary texts through their reception in different historical moments and cultures (reception history). By focusing on the contextualisation of both the production and the reception of literature, as well as on the performative character of the reading process, reception theories provide literary studies with the conceptual and methodological tools to address issues such as plurality and cross-cultural discourse. Significantly, reception theory is an operational model that also functions as a theory of the literary text. I agree with Jonathan Culler's argument that to stress literature's dependence on particular modes of reading is a firmer and more honest starting point than is customary in criticism. One need not struggle [...] to find some objective property of language, which distinguishes the literary from the non-literary, but may simply start from the fact that we can read texts as literature and then inquire what operations that involves. (Culler, "Literary Competence," 116)

---

Reception theory is a pragmatic and functional approach that not only acknowledges the fact that all our efforts to interpret literature are intrinsically linked to the situatedness of the interpreter/reader; it is based on that very concept. In its pragmatism and functionality, it is quite easily integrated with polysystem theory. Reception theory also provides us with a viable definition of the literary work that focuses on not only one or two of the three elements of literary communication (author – text – reader), but on all of them. The literary work is not just a vehicle that communicates an author's meaning or a self-referential and self-contained unit of meaning; it becomes, in Sartre's words, the product of the "joint effort between author and reader." It is exactly this joint effort that allows reception history to mediate former and current understandings of a literary text. Reception theory revalues the historicity of the literary work, a quality that text-centred literary criticism largely ignores. Only by emphasizing the performative character of the reading process can we account for both the historical context of the creation of the text (which includes the author's biography) and the reader's own being in time. Only by considering both will we be able to achieve what Jauss calls the "coherence of literature as an event."37

As James Machor points out, the practice of reception studies moves "beyond theoretical critique and acknowledges, explains and justifies the very different interests, contexts and interpretive communities that compose our pluralistic society."38 The study of literature as a social polysystem of (inter)actions raises questions about what happens to literature and the manner in which it is written, published, distributed, read and judged.

---

Reception aesthetics

While most of my research is concerned with reception history — the historical manifestations of the reception process as determined by politico-cultural agents and factors — an overview of the key concepts of reception aesthetics — the actual steps performed by individual readers — is necessary at this point as it provides a larger critical context into which to integrate our findings. Reception theorists such as Wolfgang Iser, Hans Robert Jauss and Peter Rabinowitz approach different facets of the reading process.

The activity of reading is more challenging than both author- and text-centred approaches to literature imply. Reading is challenging in as much as it does not mean applying the right rules in order to get the right meaning out of a text originally developed by a single author. Reading does not mean close reading in the tradition of New Criticism, either. Reading is complicated because it means having a starting point; it implies many abilities, such as being able to paraphrase and making sense of the words, sentences, paragraphs and pages in front of us. Reading means raising expectations that are either fulfilled or denied. Reading means looking for coherence, by focusing on certain elements and ignoring others. There is no one-way traffic in reading; there is an interaction between text and reader, a virtual dialogue. Readers are not passive recipients who reproduce an already established meaning; they actively participate in the making of meaning.39

Until the advent of reader response criticism, one of the most neglected facts in literary history was that “readers need to stand somewhere before they pick up a book and the nature of that ‘somewhere’ [...] significantly influences the ways in which they interpret (and consequently evaluate) texts.”40 Every reader has a horizon of expectations that will be either fulfilled or denied. Hans Robert Jauss introduced the term as one of

---

39 "One should conceive of meaning as something that happens, for only then can one become aware of those factors that precondition the composition of the meaning."

40 Peter J. Rabinowitz, Before Reading: Narrative Conventions and the Politics of Interpretation (Columbus, Oh.: Ohio State University Press, 1997), 2.
the major devices by which to integrate history and aesthetics of reception. By horizon of expectation, Jauss means “an intersubjective system or structure of expectations, a ‘system of references’ or a mind-set that a hypothetical individual brings to a given text. All works are read against some horizon of expectation.” The Erwartungshorizont in Jauss’s theory is an adaptation of the concept of horizon in the phenomenology and hermeneutics of Edmund Husserl and Martin Heidegger but mostly of Gadamer’s concept of horizon as our limited perspective on reality. Yet, a horizon is not a closed standpoint, it actually is something into which we move and which moves with us. Jauss adopts Gadamer’s view of understanding as a process of fusing the present horizon with a past horizon (Horizontverschmelzung). This procedure of projecting one horizon onto another, be it a past horizon or a culturally different one, is a basic presupposition for any act of interpretation. Because Jauss conceives of the reading process as the opposite of an arbitrary series of purely subjective impressions, our present reading and interpretation of a determined text is part of an evolution, is inserted in a bigger system of reference. Jauss’s theory concentrates on devices in the literary text that trigger signals and memories and bring the reader “to a specific emotional attitude.” Thus, “[a] literary work, even when it appears to be new, does not present itself as something absolutely new in an informational vacuum, but predisposes its audience to a very specific kind of reception” (Jauss, Aesthetic of Reception, 23). Our initial horizon of expectations, also called paradigmatic isotopy, is constantly varied, corrected and altered with every interaction with the text and thus becomes a syntagmatic horizon of expectations.

42 “to have a horizon” means not being limited to what is nearby but being able to see beyond it. A person who has an horizon knows the relative significance of everything within this horizon, whether it is near or far, great or small. Similarly, working out the hermeneutical situation means acquiring the right horizon of inquiry.” Hans-Georg Gadamer, Truth and Method, translation revised by Joel Weinsheimer and Donald Marshall (New York: Crossroad, 1989), 302.
Our assumptions about a literary genre and our knowledge of other works by a specific author create in us a certain expectation of what we are probably going to find in the text. As Rabinowitz points out, genre designation is extremely important and not an act that happens towards the end or after the reading process: “Some preliminary generic judgment is always required even before we begin the process of reading. We can never interpret entirely outside generic structures: ‘reading’ – even the reading of a first paragraph – is always ‘reading as’” (Rabinowitz, Before Reading, 176). We always read a text as a novel, a poem or a journal. This activity of reading as is obviously related to our being a member of a specific reading community and our knowledge about authors, genres and literary style will undoubtedly vary, depending on our literary competence.

Once the reading process starts, most readers become more aware of the existence of assumptions and expectations, especially when they have to mediate between their initial assumptions and information provided by the text that might radically diverge from what they expected. Readers also use the information they get during the actual reading process to predict what could come next. Wolfgang Iser describes two essential factors in the interaction between text and reader: gaps and negations. Gaps are blanks left in the text for the reader to fill in:

The blank [...] designates a vacancy in the overall system of the text, the filling of which brings about an interaction of textual patterns. [...] It is only when the schemata of the text are related one to another that the imaginary object can begin to be formed, and it is the blanks that get this connecting operation under way. They indicate that the different segments of the text are to be connected, even though the text itself does not say so. (Iser, Act of Reading, 182-83)

Texts, therefore, are as much about what they communicate explicitly as they are about what they convey implicitly. Filling in gaps is a reading technique that all readers handle to a certain extent. What they fill the gaps with will largely depend on their literary competence and their skills, but in order to be able to proceed in the reading process, textual patterns must be connected. The text does not have to explicitly tell the reader to fill in the gaps because one of the major efforts readers make during the act of reading is to achieve coherence; therefore they automatically try to fill in the gaps they perceive in the text.

Without the reader bridging the gaps, there is no communication. The gaps are central axes for the text-reader relationship. Iser calls the other instance in the textual system where text and reader converge negation.

Blanks and negations both control the process of communication in their own different ways: The blanks leave open the connection between textual perspectives and patterns — in other words, they induce the reader to perform basic operations within the text. The various types of negation invoke familiar and determinate elements of knowledge only to cancel them out. What is cancelled, however, remains in view, and thus brings about modifications in the reader’s attitude toward what is familiar or determinate — that is, he is guided to adopt a position in relation to the text.44

In Iser’s description of the act of reading, the operational character of reception theory becomes apparent. Readers perform basic operations within a text (by filling in the gaps) and they have to adopt a position in relation to the text (by dealing with negations of their expectations). In this formulation of the reading process, elaborated in the 1970s, one can already see the germ of what Iser later calls transactional loops: “what is mutually transposed is never fully in view but masked by symbols […] [I]nterpretation, owing to the trial-and-error pattern that structures transactional looping, becomes self-correcting.”45

Readers with different starting points due to different historical and cultural backgrounds will perceive different sections of a text as gaps or interpret these gaps differently; what is perceived as negation also depends on the initial assumptions brought to the text. Thus, gaps and negations function as the latent or potential meanings in a given, overdetermined text. There are as many sections in a text that can be perceived as gaps or negations as there are potential meanings in a text. Whether they are perceived as such to a large extent depends on the historical and cultural background of the readers.

While reading and after having read a text, readers perform a combination of three activities: naming, bundling and thematizing. Readers automatically tend to name what they have read (readers can name feelings described in a piece of writing, such as 'love,' long before it is literally spelled out in the text); they bundle information which is dispersed in the text itself (they find analogies and parallels in both form and content), they thematize what they have read (they distinguish 'good' and 'evil' characters and those which are difficult to characterize, for example). All of these activities are carried out in the name of configuration and coherence.

According to traditional criticism, it is the text that is either coherent or not: coherence is based almost entirely on textual, thus objective, factors. What reception theorists argue is that readers want texts to be coherent. Readers assume that texts are coherent, even if this coherence is not always given at the first approach to the text. In order to achieve a sense of coherence, during the act of reading readers fill in gaps, tame the surplus of information and bundle disparate sections of the text. Then, after having read a paragraph, a chapter, but especially after having finished the text, they give the totality a new, complete sense. This does not mean, however, that a text's coherence wholly depends on individual readers, either.

In arguing that coherence is more usefully discussed as an activity by readers rather than a property of texts, I am not arguing that the coherence that results is unintended by the author. The gaps found in the texts, in other words, are not necessarily either errors or even ambiguities – they may well be intended as opportunities to us to apply rules of coherence in some guided fashion. In fact [...] this is often one of the strongest ways an author can express his or her meaning. (Rabinowitz, Before Reading, 147)

The striking claim here is that gaps are one of the most powerful ways in which authors can express themselves. It is not said, however, that all of these gaps are perceived as such by every single reading community. Only an ideal reader would be able to see them for what they are and fill them in according to the author’s wishes. However, thus conceived of, gaps are a powerful locus for the encounter and exchange between authorial intent and the reader’s assumptions.

Although readers always read from a vantage point, they can change their assumptions while reading because their literary competence includes this feature as well. Because the literary text is not only a commentary of biographical, social or political concerns (a product of a specific historical period) but the locus of social formation as well, Horizontverschmelzung is a model for understanding the past while contemporaneously forming and being formed by the past.

Trying to understand something (more or less) remote, geographically and/or temporally, entails bearing a certain tension, as Gerald Bruns describes:

What tradition preserves or rather entails is not a deposit of familiar meanings but something strange and refractory to interpretation,

47 The first generation of reader-oriented criticism is not necessarily interested in actual readers (as in empirical, flesh and bone readers living in time and space) but in two other types of readers. Essentially, reader-oriented theory distinguishes three different types of reader: the actual reader who reads in time and as part of a specific interpretive community (or several interpretive communities); the textual reader (Prince’s narratee, for example), and a sort of ideal reader who “would have to have an identical code to that of the author” (Iser, Act of Reading, 28-29). The ideal reader is able to carry out an ideal reading of the text, by approaching the text with the right assumptions, by applying the right reading strategies and by arriving at the right conclusions. This extremely sensitive and erudite reader has been given many names: model reader (Eco), superreader (Riffaterre) the informed reader (Fish), the implied reader (Iser). Obviously, these readers all have got a special ability that distinguishes them, but simplifying one could say that they all conform to Iser’s statement quoted above. Instead of these terms, I find Peter Rabinowitz’s distinction between actual reader and authorial reader most persuasive. Rabinowitz’s authorial reader is not an ideal reader who escapes all presuppositions. Rather, “[authorial reading] recognizes that distorting presuppositions lie at the heart of the reading process. To read as authorial audience is to read in an impersonal way, but only in a special and limited sense. The authorial audience has knowledge and beliefs that might well be extrapersonal – that is, not shared by the actual individual reader. […] The authorial audience’s knowledge and beliefs may even be extracommunal – that is, not shared by any community (and we all belong to several) of which the actual reader is a member at the historical moment of reading” (Rabinowitz, Before Reading, 26). See Gerald Prince, “Introduction to the Study of the Narratee,” in Reader-Response Criticism. From Formalism to Poststructuralism, ed. Jane P.
Tompkins (1980), 7-25; Prince “Narratology and Narratological Analysis,” Journal of Michael Riffaterre, La production du texte (Paris: Seuil, 1979). Also see Fish 1998 and Iser 1990.
resistant to the present, uncontainable in the given world in which we find ourselves at home [...]. In a critical theory of tradition, tradition is not the persistence of the same [...]. The encounter with tradition, to borrow Gadamer's language, is always subversive of totalization or containment. For Gadamer, this means the openness of tradition to the future, its irreducibility to the library or the museum or to institutions of interpretation, in its refusal of closure or of finite constructions.48

Bruns only refers to the fusion of horizons between past and present; but I believe that his argument holds true for cross-cultural reading, as well. There is always an element of conflict in engaging with the 'foreign' (however defined) because it entails experiences of negation of our assumptions and expectations. By interacting with other horizons and with other polysystems we realize that our consciousness is conditioned by habit. Still, we are able to interact with the translated texts and learn from the experience. Bruns describes the encounter with tradition as "never an assimilation of what appears to be alien, but always a critical appropriation of otherness" (Hermeneutics Ancient and Modern, 237). This concept is similar to Iser's impact between cultures.49 Reading literature is a very effective way of interacting with the past and other cultures – and it is an extremely challenging and dynamic experience.

Iser sees communication in literature as a "process set in motion and regulated not by a given code but by a mutually restrictive and magnifying interaction between the explicit and the implicit, between revelation and concealment" (Act of Reading, 169). The way Iser frames this interactive concept of communication in literature reminds one of his description of the process of cross-cultural exchange, formulated about ten years later, to which I will return in chapter 2.

The interactive nature of the reading process constitutes a challenge.

Faced with a text, the reader can transform the words into a message that deciphers for him or her a question historically

49 See, for example, Iser, Range of Interpretation, 179: "Converting the black box between cultures into a dynamism, exposing each one to its otherness, the mastery of which results in change."
unrelated to the text itself or to its author. This transmigration of meaning can enlarge or impoverish the text itself: invariably it imbues the text with the circumstances of the reader. Through ignorance, through faith, through intelligence, through trickery and cunning, through illumination, the reader rewrites the text with the same words of the original but under another heading, re-creating it, as it were, in the very act of bringing it into being.\textsuperscript{50}

How specific texts are "imbued with the circumstances of the reader" and how this can cause a "transmigration of meaning" is not the stuff of reception aesthetics that concentrates on the operations in the interaction between text and reader on a more abstract level and therefore inevitably defines an ideal practice. The second strand of reception theory, reception history, however, aims to analyze how the transmission of meaning changes over time and is thus more oriented towards practicality and empirical data.

Reception history

If aesthetics of reception is interested in the abstract idea of the reader and provides an explanation for the reading process per se, reception history is interested in real (flesh and blood) readers and their interpretations. Obviously, a certain type of reception history (or a new approach to literary history) is contained to some degree in Jauss's aesthetics of reception: the horizon of expectations in which the text was first published is different both from our own and all the other horizons of the readers between then and now. The text is an unstable mediator between horizons. Interpretation becomes possible by the fusion of horizons and thus is a function of history. In this newly defined literary history, the reader has become, in Jauss's words, the arbiter (Instanz) of a new history of literature.\textsuperscript{51} However, reception history is not exclusively literary history. It is, as I will show, an approach that focuses on how power structures in the politico-cultural field take shape and shift over time. Several disciplines in the humanities are practising forms of reception history: inter alia, book history, cultural studies, film studies, bible studies and comparative literature.

\textsuperscript{50} Alberto Manguel, A History of Reading (New York: Viking, 1996), 211.

Defined as “the ‘missing link’ of book history” and, I contend, of cultural studies at large, the actual reader has been grossly neglected until the last decade of the twentieth century, with the honourable exceptions of Q. D. Leavis’s Fiction and the Reading Public (1932), Richard Altick’s The English Common Reader (1957) and Carlo Ginzburg’s The Cheese and the Worms: The Cosmos of a Sixteenth Century Miller (1976). What emerges from these works is that reading is both a social and an individual phenomenon. While the description of the act of reading, especially in Iser’s work, theorizes the different steps necessary for an individual reader to make sense of a text, reading considered from the point of view of the history of reception is a social, communal act. Although they are made up of real, empirical acts, reception processes are difficult to investigate in their totality. The sources for this work are plentiful, yet their use is also problematic: empirical evidence for reception processes is not easy to come by and very labour-intensive to evaluate. Also, the findings will always be fragmentary as they rely mainly on written sources that have been preserved and therefore do not provide us with the ‘complete picture’ (this, however, is a problem common to all historiography). Should this keep us from approaching reception history at all?

There are two tendencies amongst book historians when it comes to answering this question. There are scholars who agree with Robert Darnton who in 1990 claimed that “the experience of the great mass of readers lies beyond the range of historical research” and then there are other scholars who have tried to prove Darnton wrong. Some of these adopt a strictly empirical approach: Jonathan Rose, for example, moves the focus of inquiry away from the individual reader to the ‘audience’ in order to analyze how texts affect the intellectual lives of ‘common’ readers. Similarly, Janice

---

Radway has conducted research with readers of romance novels or members of book clubs in an attempt to show the empirical impact of reading on the life of real people.\textsuperscript{55} What some of these book history approaches lack or do not always state explicitly is a focus on those members of the reading communities invested with discursive, rhetorical power and who play a part in deciding what is available to what readership at a determined moment in history.

In comparative literature, too, there has been a recent shift of attention towards reception studies. The second issue of \textit{Comparative Critical Studies} in 2006 was entirely dedicated to this approach. In her introduction to the volume, Elinor Shaffer reviews the ongoing research project on the reception of British and Irish authors in Europe (which between 2002 and 2012 has seen the publication of eighteen volumes on the reception history of important English language writers on the European continent).\textsuperscript{56} The breadth of this project underlines the importance that reception studies in general and reception history in particular have finally gained in the area as a means of analyzing cross-cultural discourse. What has become clear over the last few decades is that the study of reception must include a study of translations and editions of the text, modes of circulation, bookseller’s lists, as well as individual reactions (whether from literary critics or from general readers) but that it will also profit “from scrutiny of its placement or operation within the polysystem of a particular culture.”\textsuperscript{57}

Traditionally, it was accepted that literary works could only lose in translation. Translators have long been considered imitators (some more talented, some less) who distorted much of what was of literary value in the language of the original in a hopeless attempt to produce as good a copy as possible of an ‘original.’ The copy, the translation, by default had to be inferior to the ‘original’ because of two reasons: because languages do not correspond to each other (therefore the professed ideal of equivalence could in fact never be achieved) and because in the hierarchy of men and women of letters, translators automatically found themselves several degrees below authors.

Figure 1: Traditional view of literary texts in translation

As an alternative, I would like to offer a diagram that helps to visualize the agents and factors that shape cross-cultural reading. I need to acknowledge my debt to Robert Darnton’s model of the communication circuit, one of the foundational models of Book History. Darnton concentrates on several more agents than I do (printers, binders, suppliers, shippers and booksellers) but in the course of chapter 2 it will become apparent why rather than taking into account the entire circuit I have decided to focus on those agents whose functions are mainly defined by reading.

58 The diagram has been reproduced in a variety of books. See, for example, Robert Darnton, “What is the History of Books?” in Finkelstein and McCleery, The Book History Reader, 9-26. The diagram is to be found on page 12.
Each of the agents is constrained by several factors of milieu (summarized by Darnton under three headings: political concerns, intellectual influences, and economic and social conjuncture). All agents are, of course, first and foremost, readers of literature. In a second step, some of them – authors, translators, and adaptors – produce literary texts. Some agents – translators, editors, literary critics, and academics – also produce texts about literary texts: translators’ notes, introductions, afterwords, reviews and items of academic criticism such as articles in peer-reviewed journals, book chapters and monographs. The dotted arrows in the diagram stand for the possibility that publishers, editors and adaptors might not be able to read the original text but need to make decisions regarding the shape of the translated/adapted text nonetheless. As members invested with discursive power by their respective reading communities, all these agents actively shape how translated works of literature are presented and represented in their receiving culture.
Chapter 2: Rhetorical power and symbolic capital. The middle zone of cultural space

Book history, Leah Price writes, "is centrally about ourselves. It asks how past readers have made meaning (and therefore, by extension, how others have read differently from us); but it also asks where the conditions of possibility for our own reading came from." In chapter 1, I have defined the international literary arena as a heteronomous polysystem. Within this polysystem, a focus on works of literature in translation allows one to illustrate some of the reading strategies deployed by specific readers invested with discursive authority as representative of how specific reading communities at a given time in history engage with the ‘foreignness’ of a text. Reception studies is a broad field, interested in many issues central to other fields of investigation in literary criticism and cultural studies: authorship and authenticity, publishing (including translation, editing and modes of circulation), writing as performance, reading as (inter)action, and the question of the specificity of literary discourse. In its pragmatic orientation, reception studies focus on the self-cultivating subject (who, against all odds, should ideally strive to become a cosmopolitan, generous reader at relative ease in the realm of cross-cultural reading) and his/her position within a larger community. In this chapter, I link reception history to the concept of politico-cultural agency and I explain in more detail what I mean by cross-cultural discourse and rhetorical power. I also engage with each of the agents involved in the production of a literary text in translation in more detail, pointing out the factors to consider when attempting to draw a map of influences that takes into consideration both rhetorical strategies and symbolic capital. Finally, I engage with two fundamental concepts that trouble agents engaging with literature in translation: the issues of authority and authenticity.

One of the interrogations at the heart of my study regards the degree to which agents who shape cross-cultural discourse are able to broaden their perspective when dealing with works of literature coming from a culture that is different from their own. Comparative literature as a practice stems from the belief in the possibility of successful acts of cross-cultural communication. However, there seems to be an inherent contradiction between the distinctness of cultures and cultural practices, on the one hand, and their comparability, on the other. If cultures are radically different, how can we engage with these differences without comparing texts in the sense of setting them up one against the other, thus falling into the trap of establishing arbitrary hierarchies? Should we not reject the notion of comparison altogether?

---

When one looks more closely at the criticism and rejection of comparative modes of investigation, much of the criticism is based on a definition of comparison in terms of assimilation, equivalence and correspondence: setting one against another. When comparison stands for the search for equivalence, the questions asked are: is it possible to translate one culture into another? If so, how best to translate a term, concept or philosophical tenet that one finds in the 'foreign' text into a corresponding term, concept or philosophical tenet in one's own culture? The use of the superlative here indicates that in traditional comparisons, one inevitably establishes hierarchies. If one cannot find a correspondence between two texts, then this is because one text is superior to the other. Rather than translatability of cultures and correspondence, in my argumentation I use another concept, Wolfgang Iser's cross-cultural discourse to avoid falling into the 'correspondence trap.'

Cross-cultural discourse

Wolfgang Iser draws a distinction between the concepts of translating cultures and cross-cultural discourse.\(^2\) When talking about translating cultures, one assumes that it is possible to establish transcendental relationships between different cultures and that there is an overarching third dimension (an objective tertium comparationis) under which this translation is possible (a universal realm of meaning outside and independent of language).\(^3\) Cross-cultural discourse, however, establishes itself as an interlinking network that does not base itself on correspondence and thus does not translate, transpose or assimilate one culture into another.\(^4\) Still, it results in a gradual impact of and between cultural discourses.

---

A discourse of this kind is not to be mistaken for a translation, as translatability is to be conceived of as a set of conditions that are able to bring about a mutual mirroring of cultures. It is therefore a pertinent feature of such a discourse that it establishes a network of interpenetrating relationships. These, in turn, allow for a mutual impacting of cultures upon one another, and simultaneously channel the impact. [...] The network itself is a web of mobile structures, functioning as an interface between different cultures. (Iser, “Emergence of a Cross-Cultural Discourse,” 248)

A mutual mirroring of cultures implies a binarism, a dialectic (the Self and the Other, the West and the rest of the world); one always has to choose a side. A network, on the other hand, allows us to consider multiple possibilities or variations (a repertoire, in Even-Zohar’s sense). There is movement between the structures, a constantly shifting and changing discourse that is defined by a very specific patterning and repatterning of concepts. This practice works as follows: the receiving culture judges the foreign culture/text according to its own standards, thus trying to assimilate it. However, something in the foreign culture/text resists complete assimilation and readers in the receiving culture have to reshape their assumptions before making a renewed effort at understanding the foreign object. Iser calls this back and forth movement “transactional loops”:

\(^3\) Traditionally, intercultural translation has always been linked to a more or less utopian vision of universalism and has defined languages (and subsequently, cultures) as elements of a shattered unity with the hope that this unity might be achieved (perhaps by finding the right vocabulary). Aleida Assman calls this ideal the ‘regulative idea of the One’ and rightly points out that until very recently, it has been the necessary framework for intercultural translation. For the impact the story of Babel and the term Oneness (Ekhad) on the universalization of Western discourse throughout the ages see Assman, “The Curse and Blessing of Babel; or, Looking Back on Universalisms” in Budick and Iser, The Translatability of Cultures: Figurations of the Space Between, 85-104.

\(^4\) See Iser, “The Emergence of a Cross-Cultural Discourse,” 244.
In such a back-and-forth movement, the hermeneutic circle operates in transactional loops, due to the fact that what is mutually transposed is never fully in view but masked by symbols. As there is no external reference for such a procedure, the looping can only be fine-tuned by continually scrutinizing what the transactional loops render tangible. Thus interpretation, owing to the trial-and-error pattern that structures transactional looping, becomes self-correcting. (Range of Interpretation, xi)

Rather than conceiving of the relationship between two cultural products issued from different backgrounds in a binary manner made possible by an overarching third dimension (universality), the method advocated here acknowledges a different kind of triangular nature in acts of cross-cultural reading: the source text, the translated text and the unstable, shifting meaning grafted upon the translated text that changes by ways of transactional loops. In a never-ending chain of transactional loops, the reading becomes more varied and, ideally, more complete. Cross-cultural readings and cross-cultural conversations about literature undoubtedly are modulated and even distorted by uneven power relations that are usually also reflected in the rhetorical strategies deployed by the agents involved. My close engagement with the reception history of works by Tagore, Ben Jelloun and Fo in chapters 3 to 5 sheds light on the workings of these transactional loops by comparing the reception of works of literature at different points in time and space, taking into consideration the situatedness of all agents involved.

Admittedly, handling an open, constantly changing system such as cross-cultural discourse is more difficult and does not offer the prospect of exhaustive analysis. However, because all of our interpretations are embedded not only in a specific point in time and space but also linked to predominant modes of reading within specific reading communities, the idea and ideal of exhaustive analysis is utopian in character in any event. Contrary to most postmodernist stances, Iser's cross-cultural discourse acknowledges plurality to be one of the key factors while still allowing for the communication between different cultural systems to succeed. What impact does an acceptance of plurality in these terms have on the interpretive process?
In postmodernity, Aleida Assmann claimed in 1996, the focus on plurality and hybridity has had a considerable side effect: “Concepts like communication and consensus have become unpopular. Bridges are no longer welcome because they hide abysses and rifts. The acknowledgement of alterity, the acceptance of difference, has become the foremost ethical claim (Assmann, “Curse and Blessing of Babel,” 99). In 2006, Amanda Anderson argues along similar lines that ‘identity’, ‘hybridity’ and ‘performativity’ are subjective terms prevalent in literary and cultural studies used to “imagine various ways in which one might enact, own, or modify one’s reaction to the impersonal determinants of individual identity,” determinants she describes as “forms of self-understanding that revolve around sociological, ascribed understandings of group identity: gender, race, class, nationality, sexuality.”

Anderson points out that this approach neglects two elements which she considers important: characterological concepts and rhetoric. Anderson uses characterology not in the sense of “general observations about epistemic practices that appear in psychological analyses” but rather in a pragmatist way: “such an exercise [should] include a recognition of the historical conditions out of which beliefs and values emerge, as well as the possibility of the ongoing recognition of the many forces (psychological, social, and political) that can thwart, undermine, or delay the achievement of such virtues and goods” (Anderson, Way We Argue, 118-22). Anderson’s characterology resembles Bourdieu’s habitus in its focus on the variety of forces that impact the manner in which readers approach literary texts.

Reception history accords special status to the historical conditions that shape the production and reception of literary texts and also leaves room for a thick description of the habitus of individual agents and larger reading communities. Consensus building is very much dependent on the habitus of specific reading groups, and while all the categories pointed to by Anderson above (gender, race, class, nationality, sexuality) shape us as readers, we are also free to choose a particular reading community that interprets texts and literary currents in a way that we find either comforting.

---

and congenial to our own interpretive strategies, or, alternatively, stimulating and challenging to our interpretive strategies. In this model of intellectual engagement and consensus building, rhetorical elements play a considerable role. Before we move on to a description of rhetorical hermeneutics, let me briefly mention that in recent social theory and cultural philosophy, there has also been a gradual shift of focus away from diversity and heterogeneity towards similarity and homogeneity:

The goal is to establish lines of solidarity across cultures opening them up to visions of new possibilities of transformation rather than freezing them into systems of bounded recognition. The dichotomizing hermeneutics of difference is replaced in such situations by an attitude of praxis, which does not remain at the level of only trying to understand each other but tries to move on to ways of arriving at sets of communicative practices in order to find a more acceptable common solution to our societal problems.®

In this approach, the focus is on praxis rather than on abstract theories of difference, and on communicative practices that labour towards establishing consensus on ways of interaction rather than a discourse of incommunicability across linguistic and cultural borders. Looking for similarity, clearly, is not the same as looking for equivalence: leaving aside abstract ponderings of cultural essentialism and unbridgeable differences which have made up much of the discourse about the 'Other,' there is a conscious decision in this approach to focus on the practical tools of cross-cultural discourse.

Rhetorical hermeneutics

Reception theory is intrinsically historicized and socialized: the mediating process between a text and the reader depends on a whole set of time- and

---

® Anil Bhatti, "Culture, Diversity and Similarity: A Reflection on Heterogeneity and Homogeneity," Social Scientist 37, no. 7/8 (2009): 33-49. For an approach in comparative literature that emphasizes the similarities rather than the differences between the Eastern and Western cultural and literary traditions, see Zhang Longxi, Unexpected Affinities: Reading across Cultures (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2007). Like Bhatti, Longxi advocates a practical rather than an abstract approach: "The viability of East-West cross-cultural understanding must be shown rather than said, shown through concrete examples or citations, supported by textual evidence, rather than simply asserted in the abstract" (6).
space-specific elements that come to the fore in actual reading processes. But how can one link this pragmatic experience with aesthetics? While it is true that reception theory develops from a functional method, it is nonetheless a theory that has been developed in aesthetic terms, as well. Reception theory rejects most of the critical vocabulary of author- and text-centred criticism but in turn creates its own vocabulary. However, this apparent contradiction is easily solved if one adopts Rorty's idea of vocabularies as tools to accomplish rhetorical purposes instead of the more traditional view that in hermeneutics one aims to find the ultimate vocabulary able to express truth and beauty beyond all others.\(^7\) Rather than conceiving of hermeneutics as possessing ontological significance that could provide insight into the nature of human existence, in the context of rhetorical hermeneutics, the focus needs to shift away from a purely ontological dimension towards an ontic dimension.

Traditionally, the hermeneutic situation is conceived of as follows: The universe of linguistic possibilities creates the need for understanding or interpretation. Hermeneutic interpretation produces meaning and creates comprehension of the world.\(^8\) In the realm of literature, there are at least three mutually exclusive ways of achieving this comprehension: by focusing on the text (formalist reading), by discovering the author's meaning (intentionalist reading) or by describing the ideal reader's experience (narrowly understood reception aesthetics). The traditional approach to achieving 'correct' readings, therefore, assumes that "an accurate theoretical description of the interpretive process will give us binding prescriptions for our critical practices, prescriptions that can ensure (or at least encourage) correct readings."\(^9\) In any such a constellation, inevitably, "the threatened 'loss' of meaningfulness in cross-cultural interpretation [...]" becomes a hermeneutic project for the restoration of cultural 'essence' or authenticity" (Bhabha, Location of Culture, 126).

\(^7\) Our vocabularies, Rorty suggests, "have no more of a representational relation to an intrinsic nature of things than does the anteater's snout or the bowerbird's skill at weaving." Richard Rorty, Truth and Progress (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), 48.

The issue of latent meaning in any hermeneutical situation cannot be solved if not for the presence of another element, a rhetorical element, and an element of persuasion. Kenneth Burke claims: "Wherever there is persuasion, there is rhetoric. And, wherever there is 'meaning,' there is 'persuasion.'"\(^{10}\) Being part of a reading community entails sharing a similar literary competence, as we have seen in chapter 1. The ability to convince others of the validity of one’s explanations and interpretations is part of this literary competence, as is the ability to judge whether somebody else’s explanations are acceptable or not. The foundations of meaning, thus, are not exclusively to be found in the text (as a material object) or in language (as a system of symbols) but they are negotiated in a complicated interpretive process that involves both an act of sense making (understanding) as well as an act of making-sense-to-others (persuading). Understanding a concept, a text ‘for oneself’ and explaining what one has understood to others are intertwined in Steven Mailloux’s rhetorical hermeneutics, "a form of cultural rhetoric studies that takes as its topic specific historical acts of interpretation within their cultural contexts."\(^{11}\)

Shared interpretive strategies in reading communities, therefore, must be seen as historical sets of topics, arguments, tropes, ideologies, and so forth which determine how texts are established as meaningful through rhetorical exchanges. In this view, communities of interpreters neither discover nor create meaningful texts. Such communities are actually synonymous with the conditions in which acts of persuasion about texts take place.” (Mailloux, Rhetorical Power, 15)

In my view, Mailloux’s approach lends itself as an operational hermeneutic model because it shifts attention towards the historical struggle to determine the meanings of specific texts. As I will show in more detail in the following chapters, a focus on those agents in the literary polysystem who possess rhetorical power and are thus able to persuade others in their reading community of the validity of their claims, and on the changes in historical circumstances and potency of certain rhetorical arguments allows us to cover both individual and collective practices of understanding while avoiding unanswerable questions about the absolute literary value of a given text.

---

Rhetorical hermeneutics results from an intersection between rhetorical pragmatism and the study of cultural rhetoric. In Mailloux's model, culture is defined as the network of rhetorical practices that are extensions and manipulations of other practices (social, political, and economic), thus mirroring Even-Zohar's polysystem theory. More importantly though, in rhetorical hermeneutics, argumentation is redefined as a means to a rhetorical end, not an end in itself. By allowing the rhetorical/persuasive element into the hermeneutic circle, differences in interpretation do not have to be explained in terms of wrong and right any longer. If rhetoric and hermeneutics are to be kept separate, then we must ask questions such as: Where did past readers and scholars go wrong in their interpretation? How can we get it right? In rhetorical hermeneutics, the questions shift away from issues of value and judgment towards the functionality and modality of interpretation: How did readers and scholars of the past agree on the meaning of this text? What has changed that makes our interpretation different from theirs?

The argument for rhetorical hermeneutics seems to me even more convincing in a world in which different, very often contradictory, currents in literary theory have shown both the variety and the changing validity of interpretation. How to explain these changing interpretive practices if not by focusing on the different rhetorical and hermeneutical practices acceptable in different polysystems? An interpretation at a determined point in history and within a certain reading community has to be persuasive in that specific context. It will not, it cannot be eternally valid, but it will always have to be persuasive in its own time and place. Although the vocabularies, as well as the literary competence of reading communities and whole polysystems will constantly and unstoppably change, human beings will still want and have to make sense of what surrounds them, for themselves and for others. Kenneth Burke once described human existence as an “unending conversation.”

---

12 Mailloux's theory also echoes Foucault's theory of discourses as bodies of knowledge.

Imagine that you enter a parlour. You come late. When you arrive, others have long preceded you, and they are engaged in a heated discussion, a discussion too heated for them to pause and tell you exactly what it is about. In fact, the discussion had already begun long before any of them got there, so that no one present is qualified to retrace for you all the steps that had gone before. You listen for a while, until you decide that you have caught the tenor of the argument; then you put in your oar. Someone answers; you answer him; another comes to your defence; another aligns himself against you, to either the embarrassment or gratification of your opponent, depending upon the quality of your ally’s assistance. However, the discussion is interminable. The hour grows late; you must depart. And you do depart, with the discussion still vigorously in progress.\(^{13}\)

Ideally, we can conceive of cross-cultural discourse as a series of such conversations. Thus understood, Burke’s image implies a certain continuity of discourse and communicability of concepts between different cultures and historical periods, while not concealing that much gets ‘lost in translation’, as nobody can retrace all the steps. Still, it is possible ‘to catch the tenor’ of the conversation and then pitch in, while one is perfectly aware of the fact that the conversation will continue (with other participants and according to other conversational rules, of course) long after one’s own present contribution.

The pragmatism of rhetorical hermeneutics integrates well with the functionality of reception theory. By shifting the attention away from the search for the ultimate meaning or the best hermeneutic vocabulary towards the process of making sense and the rhetorical/persuasive element in interpretation, it provides us with an explanation for the ephemerality of interpretive acts while preserving the possibility of interpretation _per se_ as well as the prospect of relating to the interpretive acts of others: even though we reach different conclusions in our reading, we still employ similar strategies. This kind of hermeneutics is pragmatic and functional as well as rhetorical, enabling us to share our viewpoints with the members of our reading community.

While my descriptive und pluralist method cannot offer a universally valid model for the processes that create literary reputation and literary obscurity, it focuses on certain agents and operations in the literary universe that critics can observe and compare. As a hermeneutic model, it is very explicit about the historical and rhetorical specificity of all acts of interpretation, including its own situatedness in time and space. I agree with Mailloux that “rhetorical politics is inseparable from hermeneutics, and by necessary extension from ethics, epistemology, and aesthetics as well” (Rhetorical Power, 168). Shifting the focus towards the rhetorical strategies that influence every single interpretation, however, does not diminish the real impact that particular interpretations might have:

Taking a position, making an interpretation, cannot be avoided. Moreover, such historical contingency does not disable interpretive argument, because it is truly the only ground it can have. We are always arguing at particular moments in specific places to certain audiences. Our beliefs and commitments are no less real because they are historical, and the same holds for our interpretations. (181)

In the following section, I engage with an apparent paradox: although there are several agents who actively shape a text and influence the text’s standing in a specific literary polysystem and although these agents are endowed with varying degrees of symbolic capital, they are very often also ‘invisible’ to the general reader.14

---
14 I use ‘symbolic capital’ in Bourdieu’s sense. Symbolic capital is bound to individuals or institutions that hold positions of a certain prestige and are recognized as legitimate consecrating authorities within a given culture at a given time. See Pierre Bourdieu, Outline of a Theory of Practice (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977), 183. Also see Pierre Bourdieu, Distinction: A Social Critique of the Judgement of Taste, trans. Richard Nice (London: Routledge, 1984).
Politico-cultural agents: ‘invisible hands’ at work

The premise for any study of the manifestations of literary reception is the belief in the authority exercised by agents invested with rhetorical power in a specific culture at any given time. Agent is, of course, a sociological concept, designating “an entity endowed with agency, which is the ability to exert power in an intentional way.”¹⁵ In the case of literary production, it is not only the author who is able to exert power in an intentional way, but other agents’ rhetorical power and symbolic capital are also important factors to consider. Far from being Casanova’s autonomous literary authorities, the agents who shape the literary field are embedded in and bound by societal, economic and political elements in their lives. By virtue of their positions at university, in cultural institutions, in publishing houses and, in some cases, because of their ties to government, members of this intellectual elite influence what books are made readily available on the market. All agents are individuals who can “simultaneously [be] the product of a given culture and the artisans of cultural change.”¹⁶ In some extreme cases, an elite reading community invested with enough power at a given time in a given culture can also make or break the reputation of writers and thinkers, as we shall see in the case of William Faulkner further on in this chapter. However, by claiming that agents are steeped in a particular tradition at a particular time in history is not to ascribe all of their actions to those coordinates only. As Homi Bhabha points out, “agency requires grounding, but it does not require a totalization of those grounds. It requires movement and manoeuvre, but it does not require a temporality of continuity or accumulation; it requires direction and contingent closure but no teleology and holism” (Location of Culture, 185).

The illusion of a single-authored book soon fades as one reads the acknowledgements of any book, whether translated or not. But how many readers bother to read the acknowledgements or, if they do, pause to reflect on the discrepancy between the one name on the cover of the book and the number of people mentioned (and the number of people not mentioned) who have influenced the shape and the ‘distinctive voice’ of the book? Most general readers will still assume that when they read Dan Brown in the original English it is mainly the author’s voice they are engaging with. Nearly as many readers, however, would still assume that very same thing when they read Dan Brown in French. The second (clearly marked) voice of the translator is blanked out; so are many other voices despite signs of the presence of other agents. Depending on the publishing strategies adopted, the translator will be named, quite prominently in some cases, less prominently in others. Depending on the perceived remoteness of a text (both historically and geographically), publishers may decide that explanatory introductions and notes are necessary. A novel by Cecelia Ahern or a sequel to Bridget Jones’s Diary, for example, will not necessitate much critical apparatus. A student edition of Shakespeare’s Macbeth will provide plenty of information to the reader, who then has the choice whether to delve into the information provided before or after reading the main text, or whether to ignore the critical apparatus altogether.

There are several ‘invisible hands’ besides the author who shape a text in translation.\(^\text{17}\) Somebody needs to propose a book for translation based on the belief that it will sell and/or have a considerable impact on the target culture. Then somebody needs to look for a qualified translator. The translator translates the book into the target language, negotiating not only linguistic but cultural differences, as well. Somebody at the publishing house needs to sanction this translation and decide whether the text can stand on its own or whether it needs a critical apparatus (which can take a variety of forms: preface, introduction, footnotes, postscript). Somebody must decide what sort of format or series the translated book should be published in and how to advertise it: ‘classic of world literature’, ‘the French bestseller’, ‘from the winner of the XXX-award’. In the twenty-first century, one could easily

\(^{17}\) The term ‘invisible hand’ has famously been coined by Adam Smith as a metaphor to describe a concealed mechanism in which self-interested acts have unintended benign consequences, such as socially advantageous spontaneous orders. For a detailed discussion of the evolution of the term in Smith’s writings and its use in later political theory, see Craig Smith, Adam Smith’s Political Philosophy: The Invisible Hand and Spontaneous Order (London: Taylor and Francis, 2006).
write off these labels as marketing strategies, and some of them are; yet it is also true that these labels are not just given by publishers interested in monetary profit but other agents whose symbolic capital is tied to the symbolic capital of the writers and books they associate themselves with. Also, decisions must be taken about established masterpieces and new writings from different cultures: which of these shall make it into the catalogue of a publishing house? In the case of a 'classic,' is a new translation needed or advisable or will an older one do?

The agents in the field of world literature in translation, therefore, are responsible for one or more of the following activities: selection, translation, presentation, commentary and criticism. This is not the place for an extensive description of the publishing world in the twenty-first century or, indeed, the substantial changes that have occurred in the last decades in that world. The roles described in the following sections are very broad sketches of the responsibilities and activities of the agents involved that will be complemented with more empirical detail in the case studies in chapters 3 to 5. Another matter to consider is that the positions of these agents will change slightly in different polysystems but there is enough common ground, I think, to work these functions into my model. In Italy, for example, publishing houses do not usually employ in-house readers; editors or freelance readers are expected to fulfil that role. In Germany, the role of the reader is clearly distinguished from the role of the editor and for a very long time, the larger publishing houses employed in-house readers, although this is also changing.

In his influential essay on book history, Darnton wrote: "Books belong to circuits of communication that operate in consistent patterns, however \[16\] For a recent comprehensive study of the fundamental changes in the publishing industry in the United Kingdom and the United States, see John B. Thompson, Merchants of Culture: The Publishing Business in the Twenty-First Century (Cambridge and Malden, MA: Polity, 2010).

\[19\] The first 'Lektoren' appeared in German publishing houses of the 1790s. It was not until 1900, though, that the roles became institutionalized. Nowadays, the reader is becoming more of a product manager who needs to argue for the value of a literary product in economic as well as in aesthetic terms. Also, there is a trend in German publishing to work with freelance readers rather than employing them fulltime. See Ute Schneider, Der unsichtbare Zweite: Die Berufsgeschichte des Lektors im literarischen Verlag (Göttingen: Wallstein Verlag, 2005). For a general overview of the German literary marketplace, see Steffen Richter, Der Literaturbetrieb. Eine Einführung. Texte – Märkte – Medien (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2011).
complex they may be. By unearthing those circuits, historians can show that books do not merely recount history; they make it."\(^{20}\) In the circuit of communications discussed in this study, I am particularly interested in those agents that occupy what James F. English has called the middle-zone of cultural space: agents involved in the publishing chain who shape the book prior to its publication (publishers, translators, editors and professional readers) and agents involved in positioning the published book within the literary field once it has been published (literary critics and academics).\(^{21}\)

Publishers

The field of publishing is not uniform and publishing chains are not rigid. Even within a single cultural polysystem, the role of a publisher working at an internationally renowned corporation will differ from that of publishers at independent, smaller imprints who very often also work as editors.

The portrayal of publishers as mainly interested in profit and not necessarily in literary quality is virulent, especially in these last decades (ever since multinationals came to rule the English-language book market). However, as David Finkelstein points out, it is from the 1500s onwards that "printers saw that money could be made from printed plays branded with named and known authors. Their authentication of "authoritative texts" could then be used to enhance their market value."\(^{22}\) I shall return to the issue of authentic and authenticated texts further on in this chapter, but would like to focus on the key functions of the publisher here.

John B. Thompson argues that publishers nowadays fulfil six key functions: 1) content acquisition and list-building; 2) financial investment and risk-taking; 3) content development; 4) quality control; 5) management and coordination; and 6) sales and marketing.\(^{23}\) Other agents in the field, such as authors trying to get published or editors trying to push a particular book,

---

\(^{23}\) See Thompson, Merchants of Culture, 19.
often portray publishers in a negative light (as gatekeepers or filters who are unwilling to take too many risks). However, publishers do not only act as gatekeepers but in many cases play an active role in shaping individual works, on the one hand, and distinct literature lists, on the other. For the third and fourth functions, content development and quality control, publishers usually rely on the expertise of editors, readers and copy-editors working for them. Ultimately, however, they have the final say if there happen to be contradictory opinions about a specific book. For management and coordination, publishers usually rely on in-house production managers, controllers and copyright specialists. Sales and marketing are quite distinct activities but they are both concerned not simply to bring a product to the marketplace and let retailers and consumers know that it is available; they seek, more fundamentally, to build a market for the books. To publish in the sense of making a book available to the public is easy – and never easier than it is today, when texts posted online could be said to be ‘published’ in some sense. But to publish in the sense of making the book known to the public, visible to them and attracting a sufficient quantum of their attention to encourage them to buy the book and perhaps even to read it, is extremely difficult – and never more difficult than it is today. [...] Good publishers – as one former publisher aptly put it – are market-makers in a world where it is attention, not content, that is scarce. (Thompson, Merchants of Culture, 21)

My three case studies, The Home and the World, The Sand Child and Accidental Death of an Anarchist, are all so-called backlist titles and longsellers: they are kept in stock and sold in relatively small numbers over years and decades, often in the same edition. Their market is limited in comparison to international bestsellers; the general reader’s attention will go to the new publications stored in big baskets at a retail chain or a huge bookstore, often also part of a ‘3 for 2’ deal or heavily discounted. One may find each of the three books in specific sections of the bookstore, for example, ‘Penguin Classics’ for Tagore, ‘Francophone Literature’ or ‘World Literature’ for Ben Jelloun and ‘Drama’ or ‘World Drama’ for Fo. Sales of such titles might see a slight increase when an author receives an international prize or when an anniversary comes up. When Fo won the Nobel Prize in 1997 the Methuen Drama two-volume edition entitled Dario Fo: Plays was promptly reissued. Accidental Death of an Anarchist has been reissued several times in the last three decades in different translations that coincided with important new productions of the play. Each of these productions increased the visibility and marketability of both the play and the playwright. Ben Jelloun won the IMPAC Prize in 2004 for This Blinding Absence of Light. Readers drawn to this novel by the publicity that the IMPAC prize received also went back to his earlier novels, amongst which The Sand Child. While recent novels by Ben Jelloun are published in English translation by Penguin, The Sand Child and its sequel The Sacred Night were published by Harcourt Jovanovich Brace, and when the then independent publisher was taken over by General Cinema Corporation in 1991, the two novels were taken up by the Johns Hopkins University Press. As Ben Jelloun became more known internationally, the smaller publisher could no longer afford to participate in the bidding for the translation rights. However, the visibility of the Penguin translations has undoubtedly had a positive effect on the sales of the Johns Hopkins translations. While smaller publishers hardly can retain authors once their novels become bestsellers, the fact that they discovered and/or first translated an author or a book will result in an increase in their symbolic capital. In the case of Rabindranath Tagore, an anniversary such as his 150th birthday celebrated in 2011 resulted in his books being more visible in bookstores and therefore sold more copies than usual. In 2012, Tagore enthusiasts celebrate 100 years since the publication of the English translation of Gitanjali, a collection of religious poems that was the sensation on the London literary scene in 1912. This anniversary was accompanied by a timely new translation of the poems by William Radice. The year 2013 will see more celebrations due to the 100th anniversary of the awarding of the Nobel Prize that should also have a positive effect on sales of titles by Tagore.

In cases such as these, then, publishers will be persuaded to commission a new translation or a new edition when they believe that this will result in an increased (if only temporary) visibility of the product and that a new version of the text will result in higher sales volumes.
Translators, adaptors and editors as rewriters

André Lefevere defines as rewriting all those activities that influence the reception and canonization of works of literature: translation, anthologization, historiography, criticism and editing. I engage with literary critics and academics separately in the next section but do agree with Lefevere that all of these activities do in fact constitute different degrees of rewriting and appropriation; and that "the men and women who do not write literature, but rewrite it [...] are, at present, responsible for the general reception and survival of works of literature among non-professional readers [...] to at least the same, if not a greater extent than the writers themselves."^24 If a work of literature in translation is deemed to be opposed to the dominant poetics and ideology, the rewriters will either withhold the work until the circumstances have changed or rewrite these works until they are "deemed acceptable to the poetics and the ideology of a certain time and place" (Translation, Rewriting, 14). Lefevere's view chimes with Lawrence Venuti's claim that translations for the middlebrow fiction market tend towards domestication: "Since fluency leads to translations that are eminently readable and therefore consumable on the book market, it assists in their commodification."^25 Very often translations are read as if they had originated in the receiving culture: they do not strike the reader as 'foreign'. In choosing my three case studies, I have consciously picked books that strike readers as markedly foreign. In these cases, most readers are aware on some level that what they are reading is a translation and therefore there was at least one more agent involved in the creation of the text in front of them.

There seem to me two main, opposing approaches to literature in translation and, subsequently, to translators: the translated status of a work is either ignored or decried. The majority of readers prefer to ignore the translated status of a text. As a result, the translator is invisible to most readers. Alternatively, readers who emphasize the translated status of works of literature very often do so to point out what is wrong with the translation. Unfortunately, among this group, we find academics and literary critics with direct access to the original language who compare the source text and target text in terms of equivalence and inevitably end up establishing arbitrary hierarchies, mostly in favour of the source text. The translator very often is either ignored or held responsible for what is perceived to be a faulty translation or a misappropriation of the 'original' text. In the case studies on Tagore, Ben Jelloun and Fo we will see several examples of either strategy. Very often, rather than quoting from the published translation, academics will offer their own translations of extracts useful to their argument, thus further undermining the status of the translation as a text that can stand on its own.

---

There is no consensus on what exactly constitutes an adaptation. In general usage, adaptations are very often understood as involving a switch from one medium to another (novel to film, cartoon to video game, novel to play). However, in the theatre, adaptations are versions of a translated play, often penned by a famous playwright who creates a culture-specific version that is related to but not strictly based (in a philological sense) on the original play. Here, the medium is still the same (drama) but because of its relative remoteness from the original, the text would not pass (or is consciously not marketed) as a translation. In both cases (adaptations that switch medium and those that do not), adaptors generally seem to be accorded more freedom than translators although they, too, cannot escape the fact that their work will inevitably be compared to the original. While translators obviously must be bilingual, adaptors can be monolingual. Some adaptation scholars deplore that the status of adaptors is lower than that of translators (their work is not a 'genuine' translation). However, when the adaptor is a literary celebrity (Seamus Heaney or Jean Cocteau, for example, both of whom wrote adaptations of Antigone; or a famous poet translating Dante), the opposite might happen: the adaptation may be viewed as an improvement, as the adaptor is perceived to be an expert in that type of literature and therefore expected to do a better job than somebody who is 'just' a translator. As a consequence, these celebrity adaptors are often much more visible to general readers than 'simple' translators.

---

26 The discipline of Translation Studies has repeatedly drawn attention to these two reactions to translations amongst the reading public. See, for example, Lawrence Venuti, The Translator’s Invisibility: A History of Translation (London and New York: Routledge, 1995).

Editors become more visible for general readers when we are dealing with texts that are canonical in the sense that they are part of high school and university curriculums, as is the case with Tagore, Ben Jelloun and Fo. Certain books are edited by a prominent academic or specialist in the field. Sometimes, as is the case with Fo, the book is published in a series which has a Series editor – in this case the late Stuart Hood, an academic and translator specialized in German and Italian literature – who pursues a specific strategy, both in the selection and presentation of the play in a particular series. While this kind of editing seems to be perfectly acceptable, editors who rewrite large sections of a work of literature are seen as transgressing established rules. Yet, in order to create a text that will fit the expectations of its intended readership in the receiving culture, translators, adaptors and editors play a substantial role that needs to be acknowledged. All kinds of rewriters (translators, editors, copyeditors, publishers) intervene in a literary text before it reaches the literary public and yet the resulting book is still vaunted as the product of a single person, a single voice, often a 'literary genius' rather than as the result of a collaboration, a very specific relationship between the named writer and his or her rewriters.

Publishing industry etiquette and author's sensibilities dictate that the details of this relationship should remain a private affair, particularly the degree of intervention, collaboration or re-writing that might occur. Indeed, various familial guardians and copyright holders, and the publishing industry's own publicity people, continually seek to contribute to maintaining this secrecy. Yet, every so often, anecdotes surface that raise questions about what a novel is and what an author might be – in a quite different way to the death of the author, and rise of the reader, announced by Roland Barthes.\(^{28}\)

Before moving on to the agents who influence the literary standing of a book and its author after publication, let me give an example of editorial intervention that stirred up a controversy fifteen years ago, a controversy that was only recently revived.

“Bad” editing? Raymond Carver and Gordon Lish

A prominent example from contemporary literature of an uneasy engagement with textual interventions from agents other than the author is the case of Raymond Carver, recently reignited because of unabridged editions of his works being published in 2009. D.T. Max first described the issues with Carver’s edited texts in the New York Times Magazine on 9 August 1998.

While Max was working on Raymond Carver’s manuscripts in the Lilly Library at Indiana University for an article on the tenth anniversary of the author’s death, looking at the manuscripts of stories such as Fat and Tell The Women We’re Going he found pages full of editorial marks: “strikeouts, additions and marginal comments in Lish’s sprawling handwriting.”\(^{29}\) Gordon Lish was Carver’s first editor who also led him to success. What Max came across in the manuscripts startled him:

In the case of Carver’s 1981 collection What We Talk About When We Talk About Love, Lish cut about half the original words and rewrote ten out of thirteen endings. “Carol, story ends here”, he would note for the benefit of his typist. In Mr. Coffee and Mr. Fixit, for example, Lish cut seventy percent of the original words.” (Max, “Carver Chronicles,” 37).

Carver had been particularly praised for his dry, concise writing style in his first collection of short stories. What emerges from Max’s findings, however, is that that dry and concise style is due to Lish's interventions and not a characteristic of Carver's style. Who, then, is responsible for the success of the short stories – the author or the editor? Lish had repeatedly claimed that he was responsible for the final form (and the success) of a good part of Carver's short stories, but he had always been dismissed. His claims were seen as acts of revenge after Carver changed editor and Lish lost his job after having championed several unsuccessful writers.

As he changed editor, naturally, Carver's style changed, too, but the difference between these two 'periods' in Carver's writing were explained in terms of biography. The Carver of the first short stories had known a hard life and his stories reflected his despair and sorrows. But then he became successful, met his second wife, and learned that life could be beautiful. Thus, his writing changed too. Apparently, "most critics seemed satisfied by this literal-minded explanation: happy writers write happy stories" (36).

However, as emerges from some of Carver's letters to Lish, the author always felt uneasy about the situation: "Please help me with this book as a good editor, the best [...] not as my ghost" he wrote in 1982. Finally, he decided to change editor. Lish, then, asked his friends for help. Don DeLillo's answer is worth reporting in full.

I appreciate, and am in sympathy with, everything you say in your letter. But the fact is: there is no exposing Carver. [...] Even if people knew from Carver himself, that you are largely responsible for his best work, they would immediately forget it. It is too much to absorb. Too complicated. Makes reading the guy's work an ambiguous thing at best. People wouldn't think less of Carver for having had to lean so heavily on an editor; they'd resent Lish for complicating the reading of the stories.

DeLillo puts his finger on the problem: the centrality of the idea of authenticity in Western literary culture, an idea that has become linked to the concept of authorship, which I will discuss later. Carver's case is by no means an isolated one in Western literary history. The most famous example undoubtedly is Ezra Pound's revision of T.S. Eliot' The Waste

---

30 Quoted in Max, "Carver Chronicles," 40.
31 Quoted in Max, "Carver Chronicles," 40.
Land. Eliot's reputation, however, was done no harm even after the publication of the manuscript in 1968 made clear how heavy Pound's touch had been. Thomas Wolfe's fame, on the other hand, has faded considerably after it was discovered how heavily his editor had curtailed his immensely long novels before publishing them.

Carver had already included the long versions of some stories, such as "A Small, Good Thing," in his later collection, Cathedral. Carver's second wife, the poet Tess Gallagher, for years campaigned for the publication of the original version of What We Talk About When We Talk About Love. This has finally happened. Beginners was published in October 2009: this version is twice as long as its 1981 sibling and the extra text spells out much of what had puzzled and engaged readers. The publication of Beginners sparked considerable interest in the literary sections of major English-language newspapers and it will certainly stimulate scholarly comparisons between the two versions of the text and a more general debate on the forces that shape literary texts. While Carver's case certainly is extreme, perhaps it is time to acknowledge that literary texts are not exclusively, but very often, the result of a collaboration.

About his intervention in Eliot's The Waste Land, Pound once said: "It's immensely important that great poems be written, but it makes not a jot of difference who writes them." However, publishing houses, editors and authors usually agree to keep the degree of intervention and collaboration secret because they are aware that "the social character of this type of 33 Tim Groenland, a graduate of University College Dublin who completed a Masters thesis on Raymond Carver's Beginners, describes how puzzling this case is for most readers: "Beginners fascinates because it poses a series of unanswerable questions, and cannot be read without consideration of these questions. How does literature, and indeed all art, come into being? Who owns the work? Who owns the legacy? What happens to work once it enters the public domain? The fact is, it is impossible at this remove to tell what Carver ultimately wanted, and this conflict of intentions seems emblematic of his ambivalent relationship to his own work." Tim Groenland, "My Words, Your Words," Dublin Review of Books 19 (2011). Available online. http://www.drb.ie/more_details/11-09-12/My_Words_Your_Words.aspx. Last accessed on 14 September 2012.

---

production has had consequences not only for the working lives of authors, but also for the judgment about the creativity of individual authors. The uneasiness in the Western readership mainly arises from the Post-Romantic perception of the figure of the author. Carol Polgrove, who worked on Carver’s manuscript, points out that the modern reader generally exalts “the individual writer as the romantic figure who brings out these things from the depths of his soul.” The Romantic idea of the author is closely linked of the idea of genius; therefore, a text is seen as the product of geniality and not as the product of hard labour, or, even worse in the eyes of some, as the fruit of a collaboration. Ultimately, the text is seen as the author’s property and any interference with it strikes readers as a transgression of the author’s creation. I engage in more detail with issues of authority and authenticity later on in this chapter, and again in the case studies. Let us now turn our attention to those agents who influence the fortunes of writers once a work of literature is published.

Literary critics and academics

Rhetorical power is probably most visible in the intellectual circles of academia. Academic readers are drawn to certain theoreticians, say Michel Foucault, Julia Kristeva, Jacques Lacan or Giorgio Agamben, not just because of the content of their theories but also because of the rhetorical power that these theoreticians exercise. If scholars align themselves with critical approaches (such as sociology, feminism, psychoanalysis or biopolitics), it is because they are attracted not only by what is said but also by how it is said. All thinkers need to convince their readers that theirs is a better way of reading books, culture or the world at large than someone else’s past or present reading:

> The rhetorical project for an emerging critical perspective necessarily involves a threefold strategy: providing persuasive, detailed interpretations of valued literary texts; presenting a strong case for the theoretical assumptions underlying the interpretive methods; and displaying a tight fit between the critical theory and the interpretive procedure. (Mailloux, Rhetorical Power, 33)

---

36 Quoted in Max, “Carver Chronicles,” 56.

I have subsumed the two roles of literary critic and academic under one heading although they traditionally write for different readerships: literary critics direct their writings at (mainly) consumers while academics write for cultural producers. Traditionally, literary criticism in reviews was a viable career in its own right and there were people who would work nearly exclusively as critics without also pursuing an academic career. This is changing and most critics now are also academics and/or writers. This has resulted in a tighter network in which fewer books get reviewed. Reviews of new books in the reviewers' language are much more common than reviews of translations. The exceptions to this rule are retranslations of works by well-known authors.

Academics and literary critics shape the literary marketplace in a variety of ways: very often, a publisher will approach an academic to enquire about new titles in a language they are specialized in that are worthy of translation. Some academics also work as translators. However, it is by opting to teach specific books on their courses that academics ensure that there is a constant demand for those books which are kept on backlist and therefore ensure that certain titles do not go out of print so easily. With print-on-demand, however, 'going out of print' seems to be less of an issue nowadays. Still, as Lefevere put it, “the classics taught will be the classics that remain in print, and therefore the classics that remain in print will be the classics known to the majority of people exposed to education in most contemporary societies” (Translation, Rewriting, 20). According to Lefevere, most high-brow literature in the English-speaking West is “kept alive – somewhat artificially- by means of reading lists designed for institutions of (higher) education, which, in turn, guarantee a substantial turnover for the paperback lists of institutions publishing books” (21).

As consumers with special benefits, both in terms of easier access to certain publishers (especially those publishers or subsections which specialize in “high-brow” books) and in terms of their expertise in specific writers, cultures and periods, a single academic can considerably influence the reception of a foreign author. For example, it is also thanks to the engagement of William Radice, a scholar now retired from the School of Oriental and African Studies in London, that Rabindranath Tagore is being better understood and valued in the English-speaking West. A poet himself, Radice has retranslated a substantial amount of Tagore’s poetry (his latest success is a retranslation of the 1912 Gitanjali collection) as well as a considerable number of his short stories. Radice has also written extensively about Tagore and Bengali culture, thus providing Western readers with no direct knowledge of Bengali with interesting insights.

Besides their written engagement with literary texts (translations, paratexts, epitexts), academics fulfil another extremely important role: they perform and perpetuate certain ways of reading in their classrooms and fundamentally shape the way in which reading communities who invest them with discursive authority approach literary texts. One of Stanley Fish’s teaching experiments will show the importance of this function.

Fish recounts the following anecdote: In 1971, he taught two different classes in the same classroom on the same morning: one in stylistics that investigated the relationship between linguistic and literary practice; the second one on English religious poetry of the seventeenth century. As part of an assignment for the first class, Fish had written the names of five linguists on the blackboard in the following manner:

```
Jacobs-Rosenbaum
Levin
Thorne
Hayes
Ohman (?)
```

Fish was not sure about the spelling of the last name which accounts for the presence of the question mark. When his second class arrived into the classroom, Fish had drawn a frame around these names and added “p. 43.”
He then asked his students to interpret this list of names as a mystic religious poem. The poem was immediately defined as a hieroglyph (in the shape of either a cross or an altar), Jacobs was linked to Jacob’s ladder which symbolizes the Christian ascent to heaven. The ladder had, in this case, been replaced by a rose tree (Rosenbaum). The students then linked the rose tree to the Virgin Mary ("the rose without thorns). Following these leads, the poem appeared to the students to be operating in the familiar manner of an iconographic riddle. It at once posed the question, "How is it that a man can climb to heaven by means of a rose tree?" and directed the reader to the inevitable answer: by the fruit of that tree, the fruit of Mary's womb, Jesus. Once this interpretation was established it received support from [...] the word "thorne", which could only be an allusion to the crown of thorns, a symbol of the trial suffered by Jesus and of the price he paid to save us all.37 (Fish, "How to Recognize a Poem," 324)

The students further thought that "Levin" was a double reference, to the tribe of Levi and to unleavened bread. "Ohman" was read in three ways: either as "omen" (the whole poem is about prophecy), "Oh Man" (intersecting man's story with the divine plan) or simply "Amen." The question mark following the last name was explained thus: three names out of the six were Jewish, two recognizably Christian, and the ambiguity of the last name (underlined by the presence of the question mark) pointed towards the tension between the old dispensation (the law of sin) and the new dispensation (the law of love).

Because his students provided him with a coherent interpretation, Fish argues that as long as we believe we have a certain kind of text in front of us, we can interpret that text as such and will always be able to achieve a coherent interpretation. As I have pointed out in chapter 1, we always read a text as a particular type of text (a novel, a poem, a play). Literary genres have certain (usually well identifiable) characteristics that help us to establish what kind of text it is and to therefore measure the text at hand against a repertoire of other texts we have already read. However, Fish's experiment is more interesting to me because it shows that being part of a reading community such as a literature class at university is a particular situation, a situation in which the members of that particular group do two very specific things: first, they work towards establishing an interpretation that will meet the consensus of other members of that particular group by using specific rhetorical strategies that they have come to agree on over time; second, they instinctively trust Stanley Fish as the member with the highest degree of rhetorical power and therefore take his assignment at face value. Was Fish in fact not manipulating his students and therefore abusing the authority they had bestowed upon him? The unease one feels at the manipulation in this particular case points towards a larger issue.

We, as general readers, seem to expect rewriters not to abuse the trust that we, who do not have either the linguistic competence to read a translated work in the original or the in-depth knowledge to position a work in a larger context, have bestowed upon them. We expect translators, editors and publishers to respect and reproduce as closely as possible the 'essence' of a text, not to manipulate the text, not to 'falsify' or 'distort' the original meaning. We also expect academics and literary critics to provide us with tools that, again, will help us in our understanding, a 'better' understanding, of that text. The danger of such expectations is that we inevitably end up essentializing the original meaning of a text. Richard Rorty warns us that as readers we should "assume that the works of anybody whose mind was complex enough to make his or her books worth reading will not have an 'essence', that those books will admit of a fruitful diversity of interpretations, that the quest for 'an authentic reading' is pointless."^38 Paradoxically, most individual readers and most reading communities strive for exactly that 'authentic' reading experience, which perhaps explains why we have been so successful at blocking out the voices of the agents beside the author who also, and fundamentally, shape a literary text. We should, therefore, systematically think of world literature in translation as a "cultural category produced through institutions and processes" (English, Economy of Prestige, 311).

Before moving on to a discussion of literary prizes as institutions of literary consecration and their impact on the wider literary field, let me briefly mention where and how readers can engage with rewriters who are so influential in shaping the texts they read.

---

Agents made visible: paratextual and epitextual voices

Gérard Genette points out that literary works consist of a text, “a more or less lengthy sequence of verbal utterances more or less containing meaning”, which, however, very rarely appears on its own.

without the reinforcement or accompaniment of a certain number of productions, themselves verbal or not, like an author’s name, a title, a preface, illustrations. [...] The paratext of the work [...] always bearer of an authorial commentary either more or less legitimated by the author, constitutes, between the text and what lies outside it, a zone not just of transition, but of transaction; the privileged site of a pragmatics and of a strategy, of an action on the public in the service, well or badly understood and accomplished, of a better reception of the text and a more pertinent reading – more pertinent, naturally, in the eyes of the author and his allies. 39

As a site of transaction and of strategic pragmatics shaped by various agents the paratext (para-, Greek for ‘next to’ and ‘beyond’) varies from book to book. No book is completely devoid of paratext; yet there are varying degrees of paratextual engagement, from snappy blurbs to lengthy critical introductions. In prefaces, introductions, translators’ notes, publishers’ notes, afterwords and footnotes, agents involved in the shaping of the text often engage with the historical context of the production of the text as well as with authorial intention in an attempt to further the understanding and appreciation of the literary text in question. 40 Depending on the intended readership of a given text, the quantity and diversity of 40 According to Genette, paratext is “always the conveyor of a commentary that is authorial or more or less legitimated by the author” (Genette, "Introduction," 262). In literary studies, however, paratext has come to describe everything that accompanies and shapes the reception of a given text, whether it has been explicitly or implicitly legitimated by the author.

paratext and the register of these paratextual contributions vary considerably, as we shall see in the case studies further on.\footnote{Urpo Kovala distinguishes four types of paratext: 'modest' paratext (basic information), commercial paratext (which advertises other books), informative paratext (which describes and contextualizes the work) and illustrative paratext (visual elements). See Urpo Kovala, "Translations, Paratextual Mediation, and Ideological Closure," Target 8, no. 1 (1996): 119-47.}

Paratexts are either located in the same text (peritext) or at a distance from the text (epitext): the epitext is "any paratextual element not materially appended to the text within the same volume but circulating as it were, freely, in a virtually limitless physical and social space" (Genette, "Introduction," 344). Analyzing the verbal and visual material presented in the paratext is "increasingly becoming integrated into empirical research on translated texts" as it allows researchers to "focus on elements that bridge translated texts with their readers and therefore shape their reception in a major way."\footnote{Sehnaz Tahir Gürçüal, "Paratexts," in Gambier and Van Doorslaer, Handbook of Translation Studies, 113-16. Here 113.} Chapters 3 and 5 will provide a substantial discussion of the paratextual apparatus of The Home and the World and Accidental Death of an Anarchist. In all three case studies, I will examine private and public epitexts such as interviews, letters, biographies, criticism and press coverage.

Having focused thus far on the different roles that the rewriting agents fulfill and where their activity is the most visible, I now briefly point towards an important factor that has shaped the middle zone of literary space in the last century: the advent of literary prizes.

The symbolic capital of literary prizes

Over the last 110 years, several literary prizes have become institutions of quite some importance. Starting with the Nobel Prize for Literature, the Prix Goncourt and Prix Fémina in France and the Pulitzer Prize in the United States in the early twentieth century, more literary prizes emerged (and some disappeared) all through that century, culminating in the richest literary prize to date, the Dublin IMPAC prize, established in 1996.\footnote{The Dublin IMPAC Prize is a joint venture between the IMPAC company and Dublin City Council.} Any literary prize is an institution, and "institutionally, the prize functions as a..."
claim to authority and an assertion of that authority – the authority, at bottom, to produce cultural value” (English, Economy of Prestige, 51). This institutional aspect, however, is only one out of three fundamental functions of literary prizes. They also fulfil social functions (as a structural device in a competitive struggle for artistic recognition) and ideological functions (probing the notion of art as a domain separate and perhaps superior to other domains of human life).

As I have already mentioned several times, Tagore was the first Non-Western writer to be awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1913. Dario Fo received the Nobel Prize in 1997. Tahar Ben Jelloun is the recipient of the Prix Goncourt (1987) and several other French and international literary prizes, among which the 2004 Dublin IMPAC Prize. I will return to the specific circumstances of and the reactions to the awarding of these prizes in each case in chapters 3 to 5. Here, I would like to briefly point out several interesting issues of a more general nature.

Starting with the Nobel Prize and its “unprecedented ambition in terms of both the territory it claimed (no genre and no language was excluded) and the sheer scale of its cash award (the 1901 prize was already worth about three-quarters of a million inflation-adjusted dollars),” it seems that the international literary market cannot do without awards (English, Economy of Prestige, 54). In 1903, the Prix Goncourt was awarded for the first time and within months, the Prix Femina was established as a counterpart to the all-male Académie Goncourt. Membership to the Académie Goncourt was “reserved for ‘professional men of letters’, thereby institutionalizing peer judgment as the key criterion in constructing literary respectability” (Pickford, “Booker and Goncourt,” 227). By contrast, the Booker Prize, established in 1969, “was to be judged by an annually selected panel, traditionally including a ‘man on the street.’ [...] This difference in jury makeup symbolically sites the power to award prestige not in a jury of peers but in the hands of the public” (228). The situation has recently changed in France, after various scandals which revealed that up until the early 1980s eighty-five percent of the jury members either worked for or were published by one of the three leading French publishing houses (Gallimard, Seuil and Grasset) and that more than half of the winners since 1969 were also published by one of these three publishers. The Prix Goncourt has now moved towards the UK and US model: as of 2008, the jury members are no longer allowed to be employees of a publishing firm and cannot be older than eighty years of age.44

All literary prizes participate in what English calls an “economy of prestige (the economy of symbolic cultural production)" (Economy of Prestige, 75). This economy of prestige is characterized by a fundamental ambivalence: it is driven by aesthetic concerns (assessing the literary value of a given work) but inevitably causes reactions in other areas of the literary arena.

The fundamental ambivalence here – whereby artists are at once consecrated, elevated to almost godlike status (“consecrations” being Bourdieu’s favored term for cultural honors and awards), and desecrated, brought rudely down to earth by entanglement in a system of hard-nosed financial calculation, national or municipal self-promotion, and partisan, often petty politics – persists in cultural prizes to this day. (31)

Horace Engdahl, a member and the former secretary of the Swedish Academy stresses that the Nobel Prize is “an award for individual achievements and is not given to writers as representatives of nations or languages nor of any social, ethnic or gender group. There is nothing in the will about striving for a ‘just’ distribution of the prize, whatever that could be.”45 However, as the reactions to the awarding of the Nobel Prize to, for example, Dario Fo (1997), Gao Xingjian (2000) and Orhan Pamuk (2006) have shown, the choices made by the Swedish Academy are often heavily criticized.46 As we shall see in more detail in chapter 5, many intellectuals in Italy did not consider Fo, an advocate of popular theatre, worthy of receiving 46 Criticism regularly also comes from the academic quarter. However, the opposition to individual prizewinners or literary prizes in general is not doing the popularity of the awards any harm. “Modern cultural prizes cannot fulfil their social functions unless authoritative people – people whose cultural authority is secured in part through these very prizes – are thundering against them. The vast literature of mockery and derision with respect to prizes must […] be seen as an integral part of the prize frenzy itself, and not as in any way advancing an extrinsic critique” (English, Economy of Prestige, 25).

---

a literature prize; instead, lists of more deserving candidates were compiled. The Chinese government hastened to state that Xingjian was not a 'genuine' Chinese writer and congratulated France on having added one more writer to its long list of laureates. Similarly, voices from Turkey accused the Swedish Academy of awarding the prize to somebody who exoticizes Turkey to please his Western audience rather than recognizing 'true' Turkish literature. These reactions show yet another shade of a constant preoccupation that emerges from a thorough study of the reception of works of literature, a preoccupation with issues such as genuineness and authenticity which, in turn, are inherently linked to issues of authorship and authority.

Authorship and authenticity in Western thought

While a substantial part of literary and cultural criticism in the last two decades has argued for an inclusion of social and historical elements in literary and cultural discourse and the number of critics who perceive the text as an autonomous entity is decreasing, there is still a tendency to see the text as the author’s property and not as the product of an interaction that involves several inputs from different sources (author, editor and/or translator and reader). Bourdieu has called this tendency an “ideology of charisma,” obscuring the view of agents in the field of cultural production.

The ‘charismatic’ ideology which is the ultimate basis of belief in the value of a work of art [...] is undoubtedly the main obstacle to a rigorous science of the production of the value of cultural goods. It is this ideology which directs attention to the apparent producer, the painter, writer or composer, in short, the ‘author’, suppressing the question of what authorizes the author, what creates the authority with which authors authorize.47

There exists a particular strand in critical literary theory which sees literature as the expression of a writer’s personality.48 This approach claims a direct 48 M.H. Abrams distinguishes three main orientations of critical theories: mimetic (which sees literature as imitation), pragmatic (literature has a purpose and is oriented towards the audience) and expressive (literature as the expression of the writer’s personality). M. H.

A correlation between the two is present in classical rhetoric and poetics, as well as in criticism of the seventeenth and eighteenth century. However, with the advent of Romanticism, this approach to literature superseded others.

Certain of these [Romantic] critics even went to distinguish between the personal attributes which an author projects directly into his work and those which he disguises and distorts in order to hide certain facts from his readers, or from himself. As a result we find the division of a work of literature into a surface reference to characters, things, and events, and a more important covert symbolism, which is expressive of elements in the nature of his author. Furnished with the proper key, the romantic extremist was confident he could decipher the hieroglyph, penetrate to the reality behind the appearance, and so come to know an author more intimately than his own friends and family; more intimately, even, than the author, lacking this key, could possibly have known himself. (Abrams, Mirror and Lamp, 228-29)

Even nowadays, quite a large percentage of Western readers seem heirs of Romanticism in this respect. The idea that a text reveals (a smaller or larger part of) its author has become fundamental in the understanding of literature for most general readers. Some insist on this more than others. Elliott Engel, for example, calls himself a "proud member of the school of biographical literary criticism," having always been truant from "the Freudian, Marxist, deconstructionist, poststructuralist and other literary schools that seem to concentrate on illuminating the supposed genius of the critic while all too often ignoring and distorting the real genius of the famous writer." Clearly, Engel relates the term author to "the romantic archetype of the untutored genius." Writing may be an art requiring genius, but it also is, perhaps paradoxically, a craft that can be trained, at least to a certain degree. At least that is what is assumed by the trainers of translators and the convenors of creative writing courses. A cursory overview of the changing definitions of the term author over time reveals that the idea of a literary work as the untouchable property of a single person is quite a recent development.

---

In common usage, the term ‘author’ applies to a wide range of activities. It can refer to someone who starts up a game, or invents a machine, or asserts political freedom, or thinks up a formula, or writes a book. Depending on the activity and the application, the term can connote initiative, autonomy, inventiveness, creativity, or originality.\(^{51}\)

From Antiquity through the Middle Ages texts were customarily reproduced anonymously, without the least knowledge about their authors. There were exceptions, such as Homer and Virgil (the so-called auctores). Texts were reproduced and diffused because of their content, because of the effect they could have on the audience. Medieval censorship curtailed and manipulated the works of many philosophers of Antiquity in order to make them correspond to Christian ideology. Although it is true that from the very start, the idea of authorship has been related to the individual ‘subject’, we cannot disregard the fact that the common notion of ‘individuality’ in Western thought is linked to the Enlightenment and Romanticism.

Starting with print, one had to know the author’s name of a piece of writing for simple legal reasons. But the naming of the individual responsible for a text is by no means comparable to the later emphatic link between individuality and originality. This becomes clear when we look at the etymology of the Medieval term auctor on which the term author is based. According to Sean Burke, the Latin auctor derives from four terms, three of which do not imply any sense of textual mastery.

1) agere (to act or perform): this sense is close to the Medieval or Barthesian understanding of the author as acting through a text which in some way precedes its performance.

---

2) augere (to grow): for all its organistic resonances, it does not suggest that the text originates with its author but rather that it is preconstituted.

3) auielo (to tie): this term is derived from poetic lexicon and refers to the connective tissue (metre, feet) by which poets structure their verses. In many respects, this definition is similar to the Structuralist notion of bricolage, with authors seen as assemblers of codes.

4) autentim (from the Greek, 'authority'): this term is suggestive of authorship as hegemonic (auctoritas received from God and the Scriptural Canon).²²

Therefore, an author is a writer who does one or all of the following things: he performs the act of writing, bringing something into being, causing it to grow. Poets tie together their verses with feet and metres. An author's achievements command respect but they command respect for a variety of reasons: respect may be due because God is speaking through the author or, as the Romantic revolution had it, because of the individual creativity and originality of the literary genius.²³ Similarly, rewriters perform the act of writing, bring something into being using stylistics, in short: they also author and authorize texts. Yet, traditionally, their achievements only partially command respect.

Michel Foucault points out that "[t]he coming into being of the notion of 'author' constitutes the privileged moment of individualization in the history of ideas."²⁴ The peak of this development is the Romantic idea of poetry as the creative expression of the individual. William Wordsworth wrote: "Poetry is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings: it take its origin from emotion recollected in tranquillity."²⁵ The immediate act of composition for the Romantic poet par excellence has to be spontaneous.

---

and is therefore associated with sincerity and genuineness. The fundamental idea behind this concept is that one cannot lie to oneself on this first level of consciousness. Only on a second level does reflection set in and do the selective powers of memory operate. The author, for the Romantics, is an inventive, creative genius who creates an original, pristine, genuine and authentic work, both in form and content. Tampering with the authentic work of a genius automatically and inevitably reduces the work's value.

Authenticity is a concept that goes hand in hand with authority and authorship. The Greek authentikos translates as original, genuine or principal. It derives from the term authentes which is a composite of autos (self) and hentes (doer or being) and translates as 'one acting on one's own authority'. The Greek term already contains the germ of that individual and individualistic aspect of authorship that shapes the Romantic definition of an author. An authentic, original article is superior to any copy. In the domain of literary translation, consequently, any source text is automatically perceived to be superior to its translation. Also, a translator is not expected to act on his or her own authority, as it is the original that is authoritative in this case. In 1759, Edward Young expressed his discontent with the Neo-Classical emphasis on imitation and, in a prefiguration of Romantic ideas, argued that "an imitator is a transplanter of laurels, which sometimes die on removal, always languish in a foreign soil."\(^\text{56}\) A genuine article is not corrupted from the original and is true to the intentions of the original (the implication being that truthfulness and sincerity reside exclusively in the originals). Young has the following to say on originals: "An original may be said to be of a vegetable nature; it rises spontaneously from the vital root of genius; it grows, it is not made. Imitations are often a sort of manufacture wrought up by those mechanics, art and labour, out of pre-existent materials not their own" (Young, "Original Composition," 38).

From the Romantic focus on the writer's individuality there is a further development in the direction of Formalism. This step might not be evident at first, but actually the Romantic idea that a piece of writing contains an author's inner self is a prerequisite for the Formalist assumption of the autonomy of the text. If one can read an author's soul in a text, then all the necessary information has to be within the text itself. Out of this the notion of the text as a self-sufficient entity is easily developed and justified. The notions of authorship and of the text as stable entity are thus closely linked to one another, as Philip Cohen points out: "The authorial orientation and the stable, closed text are less absolutes than the results of print technology, laissez-faire economics, and the Romantic/Modernist myth of the autonomous, creative artist." Michel Foucault has convincingly argued that modern literary criticism still relies on what he calls the author function (a specific classificatory function within narrative discourse) and that this author function is still defined by four criteria established by Saint Jerôme. The author is used as 1) a "constant level of value"; 2) a "field of conceptual or theoretical coherence"; 3) a "stylistic unity"; and 4) a "historical figure at the crossroads of a certain number of events" (Foucault, "Author," 151). There still is a strong resistance among general readers to integrate into this model or function other historical figures at the crossroads of a specific event, other agents who also assign value and coherence, and who contribute to the stylistic unity of a literary text in translation.

\(^{56}\) Edward Young, "From 'Conjectures on Original Composition' " in Burke, Authorship. From Plato to the Postmodern. A Reader, 37-42. Here 37.

Authorship is, first and foremost, about fixing a text. Finkelstein argues that the reproducibility of print results in the fixing of texts in a given form.

This "fixing" of print would become a key factor in establishing authority and trust in the figures (authors) who produced these works. It would create a new profession (authorship), bring forth an entire industry dedicated to promoting such a profession, and place the printed word at the centre of social communication." (Finkelstein, "History of the Book," 77)

---

57 Philip Cohen, "Textual Instability, Literary Studies, and Recent Developments in Textual Scholarship," in Texts and Textuality: Textual Instability, Theory, and Interpretation, ed. Philip Cohen (New York and London: Garland, 1997), xi-xxxiv. Here xv. Michel Foucault voices the same concern; the Formalist usage of the notion of writing "runs the risk of maintaining the author's privileges under the protection of writing's a priori status: it keeps alive, in the grey light of neutralization, the interplay of those representations that formed a particular image of the author" (Foucault, "Author," 145).
Assigning authorship to a single individual was a necessity: whoever signed a book was held responsible for its content; in ages of censorship and the banning of books and authors this was (and still is) no trivial matter. The authority derived from authorship has positive effects (from remuneration to social status) and negative effects (from recriminations to death threats, as in the case of Rushdie’s Satanic Verses). We need to be able to attribute a work to somebody (or several, but not too many individuals) whom we can hold legally and morally responsible. Yet, anyone who has ever published a piece of work, whether of creative or academic writing, knows that writing is a far more collaborative practice than is usually admitted or than is usually apparent from the acknowledgements. It is not merely a question of attributability of a distinct voice, but rather of how much intervention by somebody who is not the author we as readers are comfortable with. If there are too many agents involved in the creation of a text, which one of these agents is responsible for making the text ‘unique’ and ‘authentic’? I should argue that some of the notorious uneasiness about translations stems exactly from an obsession with the uniqueness and authenticity of literary works.

The author or the text (both intended as absolute authority, a locus of authenticity) seem to me demand-driven functions that are foregrounded so that we, as readers, do not have to remind ourselves of the complex processes that shape the books that we read. Instead of a simple, one way communication we have a complex process that involves a variety of craftspeople, politico-cultural agents with specific rhetorical power: translators, publishers, editors, reviewers, critics and academics. They all shape texts before they reach the reading public and have the power to include or exclude works from cultural discourse once they are published. I am deliberately using the term craftspeople because all of the agents involved in shaping the final product, a book of world literature in translation, are adepts of a specific tradition and invested with a varying degree of authority because of their ‘training’ in literary matters.

The final section of this chapter shows how keeping in view the factors that I have outlined above (rhetorical strategies of particular agents and their preoccupation with authenticity) helps us to understand how the literary reputation of a now well-known figure of world literature, William Faulkner, was created.

Inventing an arch-American writer: The case of Faulkner

In the late 1980s, Lawrence H. Schwartz undertook an inquiry into literary reputation and revival that is similar to my investigation of Rabindranath Tagore’s fate in the English-speaking West (chapter 3). Schwartz directed his study towards one of the ‘great’ American authors of the twentieth century, William Faulkner. While Casanova argues that “the road to worldwide recognition for William Faulkner […] went through Paris” and while it is true that Faulkner was recognized earlier in France than in his own country, the issue of consecration is more complicated than Casanova admits (World Republic, 130). The excursus on Faulkner will not only show agents and factors that Casanova’s metropolitan and hegemonic model does not reveal but also focus on the more process- and agent-oriented methodology of reception history.

In Creating Faulkner’s Reputation. The Politics of Modern Literary Criticism, Schwartz tries to explain the following conundrum: how could Faulkner, whose works, aside from Sanctuary, were all out of print in the United States at the beginning of the 1940s and who had been defined as a difficult-to-read, nihilistic writer, be hailed as a distinctly American moralist voice that expressed a new, post-war aesthetic hardly ten years later? The central premise of Schwartz’s study is similar to the thesis that underlies my work: “The process of literary tastemaking can be isolated and identified, and […] literary fame and reputation can be studied in the same way as any other historical phenomenon.” Only if we acknowledge that literary fame and reputation are not exclusively based on a writer’s talent or on a work’s content and aesthetic qualities but that they depend very much upon the 58 O. B. Emerson conducts a similar inquiry but his focus is at once wider and narrower. While he includes literary criticism about all of Faulkner’s writing from 1924 to 1954, he strictly focuses on literary reviews and articles thus ignoring other politico-cultural factors that are included in Schwartz’s study. See O. B. Emerson, Faulkner’s Early Literary Reputation in America, (Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMI Research Press, 1984).

---

favourable judgment of the agents involved in shaping the literary market, can we understand how such a sudden reversal of fortunes is possible.

Schwartz argues that shifts on four distinct levels are responsible for the making of Faulkner's literary reputation in post-war America: a shift in critical reception, commercial innovations, changes in the political agenda and the development of a new literary aesthetic.

First, there was a critical reassessment of Faulkner's work, led by critics such as Malcolm Cowley and Austin Warren. In the journals Hudson Review, the Partisan Review and the Kenyon Review as well as in the introductions to the republished volumes of Faulkner's novels, these critics propagated a different image of Faulkner from 1946 onwards, arguing that Faulkner had been misunderstood up to that very moment and that he had simply been 'ahead of his time.' Thus, Faulkner became "universalized as an emblem of the freedom of the individual under capitalism, as a chronicler of the plight of man in the modern world" (Schwartz, Creating Faulkner's Reputation, 4).

Second, changes in the publishing industry created a mass market for some of Faulkner's books, especially the ones considered more 'popular' (those containing plenty of sex and violence). On a pragmatic level, the economic success of these novels allowed Faulkner to concentrate on his other writing; this indirectly contributed to his international standing. More importantly, however, Schwartz sees Faulkner's revival as part of a bigger political project that involved the publishing industry. There was a conscious effort on the part of the USIA (United States Information Agency) to make American books more widely available, both in English and in translation. Spruille Braden, the assistant secretary of state, declared in 1946 that "increased foreign circulation of American literature is essential to the success of American foreign policy, for it will do much to make the U.S. better understood abroad." Peter Jennison, another participant in the USIA programme, argued that books were not only industrial commodities but also "unique conveyors in permanent form of a nation's thought, expression, achievements, and aspirations. And as such, they serve national policy as instruments of persuasion in the ideological context of the mid-twentieth century. This idea of the persuasive value of works of literature is, of course, linked to the persuasive power of the intellectual elite that is intent on convincing the wider reading public of the literary value of a given work and of the central importance of a given author. Against the backdrop of this political programme, Faulkner’s revival cannot be explained away, as it were, in terms of strictly textual elements (plot and aesthetic aspects), or talent. Faulkner became a success after the Second World War – not exclusively but also – because his persona and his writing fit the wider politico-cultural agenda: as the symbol of Americanness, of anti-Communism and of traditional values.

---

Schwartz devotes the most substantial part of his study to the third aspect: the shifts in the cultural paradigm that accompanied the start of the Cold War. Schwartz convincingly argues that the American/capitalist intelligentsia had to rebut the claim that Communism, by promoting socially conscious literature linked to naturalism and realism, was working in the name of ‘cultural democracy.’ The Americans, therefore, had no choice but to insist on “an elitist aesthetic - an aesthetic that claimed important literature was remote, complex, iconoclastic, and inaccessible, and required interpretation” (Schwartz, Creating Faulkner’s Reputation, 5). Several major forces were responsible for this shift in the post-war American cultural paradigm and three were particularly influential in terms of Faulkner’s revival: the New Critics, the New York intellectuals and the Rockefeller Foundation which “came together in the 1940s to set a cultural agenda, and they used and promoted Faulkner for their own ends” (5). It is because Faulkner was felt to be compatible with the cultural, aesthetic and intellectual needs of conservative liberalism of post-war America that his fiction was integrated into the new cultural paradigm. Looking for an alternative to the pessimistic disposition and the politico-ideological inclinations of French literary critics, such as Sartre and Malraux, Faulkner’s defence of humanity, as expressed in his Nobel acceptance speech in 1949, perfectly fits the new cultural paradigm being shaped in the US:

I believe that man will not merely endure: he will prevail. He is immortal not because he alone among creatures has an inexhaustible voice but because he has a soul, a spirit capable of compassion and sacrifice and endurance. The poet’s, the writer’s duty is to write about these things. It is his privilege to help man endure by lifting his heart, by reminding him of the courage and honour and hope and pride and compassion and pity and sacrifice which have been the glory of his past. The poet’s voice need not merely be the record of man, it can be one of the props, the pillars to help him endure and prevail.62

By pointing out the agents and factors that made Faulkner’s reputation in the post-war United States, Schwartz’s intention is not to belittle the literary value, however understood by critics, of Faulkner’s writing. The specific type of reception history emerging from his study is not primarily concerned with the message or aesthetic qualities of a given text but with the interpretation of a given work or author at a particular time in history. Similarly, my aim in the three next chapters is not to diminish the literary achievements of Tagore, Ben Jelloun and Fo, but rather to shine a critical light on the intricate network of agents and factors that have shaped the reception of their works in English translation. And what better example to start with than the rise and fall of the “first global superstar or celebrity in literature”, Rabindranath Tagore?63

Chapter 3: At home in world literature? Rabindranath Tagore’s The Home and the World

Celebrated as a literary sensation as soon as he appeared on London’s cultural scene in 1912, the then fifty-one year old Rabindranath Tagore published a collection of poems, Gitanjali (Song Offerings), to which W.B. Yeats provided an effusive introduction. The poems were widely praised by thinkers and writers with very different intellectual stances: Robert Bridges, Sturge Moore, Ezra Pound and Evelyn Underhill. Sturge Moore recommended Tagore for the Nobel Prize and in 1913, Tagore became the first Asian writer to ever receive the prize. The following years saw a rapid output of English translations of Tagore’s work, among them that of the novel Ghare Baire (1916), translated as The Home and the World and published by Macmillan in 1919. In the West, there were no further editions of the English translation until 1985 when Penguin UK decided to publish the novel again. This edition was so successful that it was reissued in 1990; and in 2005 The Home and the World was published in a new edition. Despite the fact that Tagore scholars have long deplored deficiencies in the translation and other editing choices, Penguin UK opted not to commission a new translation for one very specific reason: Although Surendranath Tagore, Rabindranath’s nephew, is named as the translator, in a letter to Macmillan the author states that he was involved in the translation himself. Tagore’s professed involvement was reason enough for the editors at Penguin UK to decide against a new translation. In the preface, William Radice argues that the author’s possible participation “gives the translation an enhanced authenticity.”¹ In 2005, however, the same year Penguin UK republished the 1919 translation, Penguin India published a new translation of the novel by Sreejata Guha, called Home and the World. And the previous year, 2004, saw the publication of yet another translation, by Nivedita Sen, for Srishti Publishers. So why this sudden surge in Tagore translations into English in India? It is not merely a question of what

Meenakshi Mukherjee deprecates as "a virtual scramble among English publishers in India to cash in on the brand name Tagore," as we shall see.2

After meeting Tagore in 1912, William Butler Yeats told Ezra Pound that Tagore is someone "greater than any of us [i.e. Western writers]"3 and in his introduction to Gitanjali he prophesied an extraordinary future for Tagore and his work. Yeats and Pound were convinced of Tagore's genius when they first meet him; and in 1931 Albert Einstein called the Indian writer a 'Seer.' However, hardly thirty years later, in 1959, Edward C. Dimock was forced to admit: "While Tagore lives today in Bengal as he did fifty years ago [...] for most non-Indians, he is no longer living. He is an isolated figure. For us, he is not part of a living tradition."4 In 1966, Nabaneeta Sen expressed regret about the fact that in the English-speaking West Tagore was no longer positioned among the more important literary figures; and by the late 1980s, Mary Lago was forced to admit that "in the West [...] Tagore is known to relatively few, and not all of those comprehend his immense significance as both a literary and a political figure."5

In this chapter, I pursue five interconnected questions: 1) What factors were at play in the English-speaking Western world to reduce Tagore to a marginal figure in literature by 1960? 2) What has changed over the last three decades in which Tagore has slowly been re-introduced into the English-language canon of world literature? 3) How does the reception of Tagore's works in the English-speaking West differ from that in European countries such as Germany, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Hungary and parts of former Yugoslavia? 4) What institutions and individuals have visibly contributed to Tagore’s reintroduction into the canon of world literature in translation? 5) How can one explain the different strategies adopted in the translation of The Home and the World, which, incidentally, has both been condemned as “a petit bourgeois yarn of the shoddiest kind” and praised as “[Tagore’s] finest single novel, [...] something like a Bengali version of Turgenev’s Fathers and Sons” as well as “the best picture of Bengal’s time of political awakening”?\(^6\)

2 Meenakshi Mukherjee, "Tagore in the New Millennium," The Hindu, Sunday, 6 June 2004. Available online: http://www.hindu.com/ld/2004/06/06/stories/200406060160300.htm. Last accessed on 11 September 2012. Mukherjee's article discusses the fact that three English translations of Tagore's novel Chokher Bali had been commissioned and published within several months from each other: one by Penguin, one by Shrishti and one by Rupa & Co. Mukherjee clearly states that there was no need for what she defines a "sudden and excessive interest" in that particular novel and attributes the appearance of the three translations to the extra-literary domain: English publishers in India wanting to cash in on the name Tagore.

As I have mentioned above, The Home and the World was published in book form by Macmillan in 1919. English-language readers would have to wait for over sixty-five years, until 1985, for the novel to be published again; this time by Penguin, with an introduction by Anita Desai. We still find Desai’s introduction in the latest UK edition (2005) along with a new preface by William Radice, additional notes, a chronology and a list of further reading. Significantly, in 1985, The Home and the World is considered a Penguin Twentieth Century Classic. In 2005, the novel is simply called a Penguin Classic. A classic, a great work of (world) literature is usually understood to be a timeless work, a mainstay of several societies and generations, one that in theory is continuously available, and not out of print for sixty years. While Tagore’s writing has never been out of print in the original Bengali and, for example, in Arabic translation, for decades most readers in the English-speaking West did not have access to his works.

The shift from initial success to literary obscurity cannot be explained by applying Casanova’s model of the autonomous literary universe. Tagore’s writing initially underwent consecration or littérisation in one of the most important literary capitals, London, and Tagore even won the Nobel Prize, which, according to Casanova, is the “virtually unchallenged arbiter of literary excellence” (World Republic, 147). If the literary universe were independent from other dimensions of life and had its own temporality, Tagore, once established as important writer in Casanova’s literary capitals, could not have been forgotten for decades. In fact, Tagore was only forgotten in parts of the literary universe, for very specific reasons that are not exclusively linked to the world of literature; and he continued to be celebrated in other parts, as I will show. Here, again, the concept of polysystem is more useful to describe the reality of literary success and obscurity as it acknowledges different cultural practices in different polysystems.

---

As with Faulkner, there were a variety of factors that contributed to Tagore’s ‘disappearance’ from the universe of world literature in English. At least five aspects were of utmost importance. First, one notices a shift in the critical reception of Tagore’s work: initial enthusiasm quickly turned into harsh criticism for very specific reasons which I will briefly outline below. Second, Tagore and his publishers made particular commercial decisions in terms of what kind of books to translate and publish. Third, the political tensions between India and Great Britain played a considerable role, not only during Tagore’s lifetime but following Indian Independence, as well. Fourth, Tagore’s focus on universalism and world peace no longer fitted the political agenda in the West. Fifth, the development of a new literary aesthetic in Europe pushed Tagore’s contributions to world literature translated into English out of focus.

While he had been to England twice before, Tagore was fifty-one years old when he was officially introduced to the West as a writer and public figure by his friend, the painter William Rothenstein. That same year, Tagore published Gitanjali in English and “on the strength principally of this volume” was awarded the Nobel Prize the following year.

---

7 Lago points towards some of these factors: “Western preconceptions and misconceptions, facile romanticising, the intractable British-Indian conflict, and great changes in literary taste” all contributed to Tagore’s ‘falling out of grace’ in the English-speaking world (Lago, “Restoring Tagore,” 5).

8 See Lago, “Restoring Tagore,” 1. This may strike contemporary readers as strange but it only reflects the instructions given by Alfred Nobel in his will. He had explicitly specified that the Nobel Prize for Literature should be awarded not for a whole corpus of works but for an outstanding work published the previous year. Nobel’s testament lists five criteria: the prize shall go: 1) to those who shall have conferred the greatest benefit on mankind 2) during the preceding year; 3) no consideration shall be given to nationality; 4) the person who shall have produced in the field of literature the most outstanding work 5) in an ideal direction. See Sture Allén and Kjell Espmark, The Nobel Prize in Literature. An Introduction (Stockholm: Swedish Academy, 2001), 7. In light of these criteria, Tagore seems a perfect candidate.
Moore and W. B. Yeats proofread and corrected his translation of Gitanjali from Bengali; Tagore asked Rothenstein to thank Yeats for helping his poems “in their perilous adventure of a foreign reincarnation.” In his own work as a translator, Tagore expresses concerns regarding the fact that texts change in translation and that readers’ expectations change as soon as the language changes. This seems particularly troublesome to the Bengal writer when it comes to translating poetry. While translating a selection of the medieval poet Kabir’s verse from Hindi into Bengali, Tagore wrote in a letter to Kshiti Mohan Sen, another translator of Kabir: “I do not want to go beyond the original text to the smallest extent, even if, as a result, the spirit of the original is not fully explicated. That spirit may remain hidden a little – explaining too much may be limiting on that spirit - poetry and theoretical explication are different things altogether.” Sabyasachi Bhattacharya sees this as Tagore’s manifesto for poetry translation and discourages the reader to look for “qualities of a creative piece of writing (or didactic explication)” in Tagore’s translations of Kabir. However, when it comes to the translation of his poetry and prose works into English, Tagore does not always stick to the original. The reasons for this are too many to enumerate here and will become clearer as we progress.

Before we turn to The Home and the World and its reception in Europe, a look at the novel’s reception in India when it was first published is necessary. The novel was received with some harsh initial criticism both in Europe and India, but for very different reasons.

A short-lived scandal – initial reception in India

Ghare Baire has three first-person narrators: Bimala, Nikilhesh and Sandip. Bimala marries Nikilhesh, a Bengali zamindar, who has just returned to India after his studies in England. He feels strongly that his wife should come out of purdah. When Bimala reluctantly steps out of her home into the world, she falls in love with Nikhil's friend, Sandip, the local leader of the Swadeshi movement. Sandip is a passionate and active man, and thus the opposite of the peace-loving and somewhat passive Nikhil. Nikhil soon realizes that his wife has feelings for Sandip but, true to his principles, decides not to intervene. Bimala is left with the decision which man she wants to be with. When she finally decides in her husband's favour, he has been fatally injured during the ongoing clashes.

---

Ghare Baire was published in serialized form in the journal Sabuj Patra (Green Leaves) between 1915 and 1916. At first, it caused a huge scandal amongst literary critics and the general readership in Bengal. The novel was attacked on grounds of immorality, lack of loyalty towards the nationalist movement and even blasphemy. Many reviews and articles of the 11 Zamindar: "In India, a holder or occupier (dār) of land (zamīn). The root words are Persian, and the resulting name was widely used wherever Persian influence was spread by the Mughals or other Indian Muslim dynasties. The meanings attached to it were various. In Bengal the word denoted a hereditary tax collector who could retain 10 percent of the revenue he collected. In the late 18th century the British government made these zamindars landowners, thus creating a landed aristocracy in Bengal and Bihar that lasted until Indian independence (1947). In parts of north India (e.g., Uttar Pradesh), a zamindar denoted a large landowner with full proprietary rights. More generally in north India, zamindar denoted the cultivator of the soil or joint proprietors holding village lands in common as joint heirs. In Maratha territories the name was generally applied to all local hereditary revenue officers. See http://www.britannica.com/EBchecked/topic/655661/zamindar. Last accessed 11 September 2012.

---

12 "The literal meaning of purdah is a curtain, but the term is used to designate the practice of secluding women from contact with men outside of the immediate family. This may be accomplished through virtual imprisonment in separate quarters in the home, veiling in public, and the provision of segregated public facilities. Seclusion has been practiced in many cultures, generally by elite groups; the practice is most widespread today among the Muslim populations of the Middle East, North Africa, and Asia, and certain Brahmin castes in India." Elizabeth H. White, "Purdah," Frontiers: A Journal of Women Studies 2, no. 1 (1977), 31-42. Here 31.

time were very harsh and Tagore felt compelled to react in writing twice. Most Bengalis of the time found the novel debauched, and attacked it because of the triangular love it depicts. However, triangular love was quite a common topos ever since Bankimchandra Chattopadhyay (1838-1894) had introduced the novel to Bengal in the nineteenth century. Besides historical romances, Chattopadhyay “also wrote domestic romances, which often featured triangular love plots that critically, with multiple perspectives, explored man-woman relations.” In Ghare Baire, Tagore uses the same format as Chattopadhyay, but his novel has more psychological depth and integrates political and social issues as well. The authorial voice is completely absent; there is no mediation between the different voices in the novel. Two interlinking elements seem to have scandalized the contemporary readers in Bengal most: Bimala’s voice is the most distinct one in the novel and this inevitably led to the discussion of a woman’s place in society. Is Bimala the description of an authentic (let alone ideal) Hindu woman? She cannot be, at least in the minds of many readers in 1915/16 because she is challenging traditionally accepted rules about a woman’s place in society. In an article entitled “The Object and Subject of a Story,” written to counteract the violent attacks on the book, Tagore points out that “Shakespeare has created many heroines, but nobody bothers to find out how far they represent the ideal English woman. Even the Christian clergy would not bother to grade them according to their Christian behaviour.”

Furthermore, Tagore was accused of undermining Bengali nationalism because critics identified the character Nikhilesh with the author.

---

15 Chattopadhyay, “Ghare Baire and Its Readings,” 187.
16 I use the Bengali spelling, Chattopadhyay (after Datta and other Bengali critics) although the surname is often spelled like the anglicized pronunciation, Chatterjee.
himself: Nikhilesh's criticism of the Swadeshi movement was seen as a direct reflection of Tagore's rejection of the nationalist movement. Finally, when Sandip makes a derogatory remark about the Hindu goddess Sita, Tagore is accused of irreverence. Tagore's answer to these accusations is that a work of literature must be seen as a work of art and not as a manual of moral instruction: "The story of Ghare Baire reflects some aspects of modern sensibility of a writer of our modern age. But the reflection is a matter of art; it is not a part of the writer's intention to impart any education – good or bad." This was a revolutionary thought in Bengal where most people "still favoured the nineteenth-century dictum that the novel was not only a personal communication from the author to the reader, but also a vehicle for delivering a moral message" (Chattopadhyay, "Ghare Baire and Its Readings," 193). This ideal notion is voiced by Jotindra Mohan Sinha (1868 – 1937) in an article written in 1920, in which he adopts Tolstoy's moral definition of a novel: "A work of art that united every one with the author and with one another would be perfect art." Sinha also attacks what he calls the "sick sentimentalism expressed by the three characters" who "seem to be vomiting out their inner most thoughts, making the whole atmosphere heavy, filthy and full of foul smell."

However, the general outrage with Ghare Baire was not to last. In the late 1920s and early 1930s, younger Bengali authors started the Kallolian movement, named after the modernist magazine Kallol (Rippling Waves). They wanted to challenge Tagore's authority but felt deep reverence for him at the same time. In his 1927 article Rabindranath in Fiction, Bhabani Bhattacharya (1910-1988) rates Ghare Baire as one of the best novels not only in Bengal but in world literature. However, he finds the characters "full of Puritanism." His view of Bimala differs completely from the one expressed by many critics only twelve years previously. Far from seeing her as unchaste and debauched, he describes her as a normal woman who, "in spite of herself, is passionately attracted towards a man other than her husband."^{22}

19 Quoted in Ray, "Tagore on Ghare Baire," 93.
20 Chattopadhyay quotes Sinha who, in turn, quotes Tolstoy as follows: "A work of art that united every man with another and with one another would be perfect art." Not only should the first 'another' read as 'the author', but Chattopadhyay seems to be (mis)quoting Militsa Greene's introduction to Tolstoy's What Is Art? See Leo Tolstoy, What Is Art? (Letchworth: Bradda Books Ltd., 1963), xxiii.

In Bengal, in a sudden reversal of fortunes that is clearly linked to a politico-cultural shift initiated by a younger generation of writers, "within one and a half decades of its publication the critical opinion on Ghare Baire had travelled from one end of the pole to the other" (Chattopadhyay, Ghare Baire and Its Readings, 199). From this point onwards, the novel entered the canon of national literature in India. Critics and readers still struggle to relate to the complexities of the novel, but the novel was no longer seen as immoral or irreverent.

Translation and editing choices

Ghare Baire was translated into English by Surendranath Tagore, Rabindranath’s nephew, and was first published serially as The Home and Outside in the Modern Review in 1918 and then in book form in 1919. Although Surendranath is named as the translator, Rabindranath himself was involved in the translation – but to what extent is not clear. In a letter to Macmillan (5 November 1918), Tagore writes: “A large part of it I have done myself and it has been carefully revised.”^{23}

It is important to note how certain ideas about the structure and register of literature in the English-speaking West affected Surendranath and Rabindranath Tagore's editing choices. As far as structure is concerned, the English novel is divided into twelve chapters, unlike the Bengali text which simply consists of twenty-three ‘stories’: ten narrated by Bimala, eight by Nikhilhesh and five by Sandip. However, what is called a ‘story’ in English is not a story but ‘atmakatha’ in the original, which is “something more than a mere story, -- the exposition of one’s atman or innermost heart.”^{24} Therefore, the division into chapters in the English version is “planned according to the new developments in the plot” introduced in the English version. As a result, the English novel seems more plot-oriented than the Bengali original which is usually described as a character-centred novel of ideas.

---

^{22} Quoted in Chattopadhyay, Ghare Baire and Its Readings," 198.

^{23} Quoted in Radice, "Preface," viii.

The editorial hand (whether Rabindranath's or Surendranath's) does not stop at a rearrangement of the narrative according to Western standards of plot orientation. It also censors parts of the original text. Certain sections of the Bengali text have not been translated into English, sentences and paragraphs that Tagore feared might upset the English readership of the time. In one scene, Sandip brags about how an Anglo-Indian girl was completely enthralled with him and in another scene, he claims that "the shock of fear increases desire in women." Either Rabindranath or Surendranath Tagore decided to cut both of these sentences. Similarly, whenever a sentence could be read as overtly anti-British, Tagore adds textual material to bring the discourse back into the personal realm of Bimala's relationship to the two men. In both versions, Sandip claims that he will worship Kali by setting Bimala on her altar of Destruction. However, in the English version, he adds: "The way to retreat is absolutely closed for both of us. We shall despoil each other: get to hate each other: but never more be free." (The Home and the World [Penguin UK], 84). Again, there seems to have been the fear of upsetting the English readers who might have read "the altar of Destruction" as an incitement to overtly anti-British behaviour.

Finally, and most importantly, there is a significant difference in register. The Bengali language has two registers: the formal language called sadhubhasha that relies heavily on Sanskrit and the more colloquial chalitbhasha. Before Ghare Baire, Tagore had used chalitbhasha only in his diaries and personal letters, as well as in one epistolary short story, Streer Patra (The Wife's Letter). Ghare Baire is the first novel to be written in the more colloquial form of Bengali – a significant step as "its forms are used to explore [...] the making of the self" (Datta, "Introduction," 8). The impact of this innovation on the readership and the critics must have been immense and is perhaps comparable to Dante Alighieri choosing to write the Commedia in Tuscan dialect rather than in Latin. Ghare Baire is the first Bengali psychological novel with its own particular language – a massive step away from the tradition. The register in the English translation, on the other hand, is far from colloquial and innovative. It is difficult to determine what in the translation is Rabindranath’s and what is Surendranath’s doing but one thing is clear: the register and style are rather Victorian and far from revolutionary. The English translation must have read as quite old-fashioned in 1918 and 1919 – at a time when parts of Joyce’s Ulysses were already being serialized in England and America, showing to what revolutionary use the English language could be put. Is the difference between the language of the original and the translation due to the more ‘floral’ character of Bengali and the fact that Surendranath (or Rabindranath) Tagore did not possess enough linguistic competence to realize how old-fashioned their English sounded? This, at least, was the argument of many literary critics when confronted with the poor reception of the novel in the West. Might the choice of register in the English version, amongst the other changes pointed out above, not rather be based on a very distinct idea about

92

28 While Ulysses was not published in book form in the United States until 1933, some parts were serialized in the Little Review in New York from March 1918 until the autumn of 1920.
In 1920, the last instalments of Cyclops, the whole Nausicaa and the first instalments of Oxen and the Sun were published. The Society for the Suppression of Vice lodged a complaint against the Little Review in October 1920. For more details see “Appendix B,” in 29 Thompson for example thought that these poor English translations were misrepresenting Tagore’s work and affecting his reputation. In a letter to Tagore dated 17 November 1920, Thompson writes: “As I have told you before, you – with great assistance from yr. publishers – have been yr. own worst enemy. […] You have lost far more of yr. own force than you need have done. Then, had you trusted the West more, had you given a selection of yr. most imaginative stuff, you wd. have been rewarded.” A Difficult Friendship.
Letters of Edward Thompson and Rabindranath Tagore 1913-1940, ed. Uma Das Gupta
(New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 2003), 126. In his correspondence to Western friends and acquaintances, Tagore himself stresses the fact that he is not a native speaker of English. See, for example, his letter to W. B. Yeats of the 26 January 1913 in which he claims to be “absolutely ignorant of the proprieties of your language.” Selected Letters of Rabindranath Tagore, ed. Krishna Dutta and Andrew Robinson (Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997), 165. In response to Thompson, Tagore writes in two separate letters: “You are right in your diagnosis. I [have] become acutely conscious of cracks and gaps in my translations and try to cover them up with some pretty designs that may give them an appearance of wholeness” (20 September 1921). “In my translations I timidly avoid all difficulties, which has the effect of making them smooth and thin. I know I am misrepresenting myself as a poet to the western readers” (5 August 1921). Letters reprinted in Das Gupta, A Difficult Friendship, 128-9.
standards in the English novel? We can only speculate about the reasons that led Rabindranath and Surendranath Tagore to modify the English text in the way they did but there is a clear awareness that there are certain expectations in the English readership that differ from the ones in the Bengali readership. While Tagore’s command of the English language was remarkable, both his self-translations and the translations that initially were partly done by his followers at Santiniketan and Tagore-philes in Europe are not thought to compare to later translations of his works done more carefully, more slowly and according to a different philosophy of translation. However, blaming the two Tagores and their faulty translation for the decline in Tagore’s literary reputation would be too simple an explanation.

A look at Tagore’s works first published in English against his overall literary output is illuminating as it explains how the image of the ‘sage from the East’ could so easily develop: Tagore published 251 books in Bengali, of which 139 were prose works including 67 collections of essays. Only fifteen percent of these essay collections deal with religious themes. Between 1912 and 1966, 57 books by Tagore were translated into English, 37 of which in prose. Half of the prose books are “books of essays.” Besides one book on Ghandi, all the others mainly or in large parts deal with religion or East-West questions (Sen, “Foreign Reincarnation,” 284-85). One need not wonder, then, that for over fifty years, Tagore’s image in the West was that of the ‘wise man from the Orient.’ As Edward Said points out, in its Orientalist attitude the West constructs an Orient from an external viewpoint to serve its own interests – this is where problems arise. Tagore’s aphorisms and Gitanjali fit the image of wise man. Other – more political – writings, such as Gora or The Home and the World, do not fit that image. Admittedly, Tagore helped shape this image or, at least, did not protest against this reductive image of the Sage.\textsuperscript{31} But with Tagore’s name clearly associated with mysticism and Oriental philosophy, the small percentage of his translated works that did not deal with these topics sank into oblivion. Between Tagore’s death in 1941 and 1980, in the English-speaking West, his name was not associated with novels, theatre or short stories – aspects of his work for which he is celebrated in India.

30 Harish Trivedi comments on the issue: “The trouble with Tagore’s own translations, as with those done by his Santiniketan associates under his own close supervision and revision, is that they diminish and emasculate the variety and vitality which constitute his unequalled greatness in Bengali. Tagore systematically left out much that was local, specific and original in his work for fear that it would prove unfamiliar and ‘difficult’ to an English reader.” Harish Trivedi, “Introduction,” in Edward Thompson Jr, Rabindranath Tagore - Poet and Dramatist (Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1991), 1-39. Here 11. Tagore himself provides a reason for this regular omitting of textual material: “I find that English readers have very little patience for scenes and sentiments which are foreign to them; they feel a sort of grievance for what they do not understand – and they care not to understand whatever is different from their familiar world.” Tagore to William Pearson, the translator of the novel Gora. Dutta and Robinson, Selected Letters of Rabindranath Tagore, 310.

\textit{A fragmented picture – translations and publications in English}

William Radice is one of the best known contemporary translators of Tagore’s poetry and short stories into English, despite his initial dislike of Tagore in English translation.

I did not, as some people have assumed, learn Bengali in order to translate Tagore. Indeed I was so put off by his English works [...] that it would be truer to say that I started to learn Bengali \textit{despite} Tagore. When inevitably as part of the postgraduate Diploma course I did at SOAS from 1972 to 1974, I read some poems and stories by Tagore in the original, the realisation dawned that he was a truly great writer, and I longed then to do greater justice to the variety and quality of the Bengali texts than he had been able to do himself.\textsuperscript{32}

Radice reiterates, here and elsewhere, that the faulty translations of Tagore’s work definitely played a role in advancing the writer’s literary obscurity in the English-speaking West. However, without considering the historical context in which these translations were written, it is easy to write Tagore off as untranslatable or, worse, as a bad writer. Mary M. Lago was the first Western Tagore scholar to point out that between 1913 and 1925, the period in which the initially passionate love affair of the English-speaking West with the Bengali writer gradually calmed down, there were several literal and literary breakdowns:

\textsuperscript{31} When Harald Hjärne, Chairman of the Nobel Committee of the Swedish Academy held the inauguration speech in 1913, he defined Tagore as “a bearer of good tidings from that treasure house of the East whose existence had long been conjectured,” blessed with “the gift of prophecy” who places before the Westerner the culture that in “the vast, peaceful, and enshrining forests of India attains its perfection, a culture that seeks primarily the quiet peace of the soul in ever-increasing harmony with the life of nature herself. It is a poetical, not a historical, picture that Tagore here reveals to us to confirm his promise that a peace awaits us, too.” “The Nobel Prize in 1913. Rabindranath Tagore. Award Ceremony Speech,” available online: http://www.nobelprize.org/nobel_prizes/literature/laureates/1913/press.html. Last accessed 11 September 2012.

literal because author, translators and editors were so often out of touch with one another at crucial stages of the work; literary because, although for more than a century Bengal had been the seat of British rule in India, there was a dearth of persons able to make a genuinely literary approach to modern Bengali literature.\(^{33}\)

Not only were there hardly any qualified translators who could have given much needed advice and could compare the translations to the original, Tagore himself left the bulk of the translations, revisions and proofreading in the hands of a “changing roster of persons in India and the West” (Lago, “Tagore in Translation,” 418).\(^{34}\) With several people working on the text, it was difficult to tell, even for Tagore, what had been his doing and what had been somebody else’s. Considering Yeats’ remark about the confusion about which corrections to one of Tagore’s poems were his and which ones were Sturge Moore’s, one can easily imagine a similar scenario happening in Santiniketan where Rabindranath translated parts of and revised Surendranath’s translation of The Home and the World.\(^{35}\) Lago asks: “Of all

---

\(^{34}\) Between 1900 and 1930, there seemed to be an increased interest in Hindi, Urdu and Sanskrit amongst students of Indian languages but hardly any interest in Bengali. See Lago, “Tagore in Translation,” 417. As far as the myriad of translators attempting to “carry over” Tagore into English, see “Appendix 3: Tagore’s Writings Published From Britain between 1912 and 1941,” in Kundu et al., Imagining Tagore: Rabindranath and the British Press (1912-1941), 628-29. Besides Tagore’s own translations, at least fifteen people tried their hand at translating Tagore’s works into English during his lifetime. The 1916 collection of short stories Hungry Stones and Other Stories provides the perhaps most impressive example. Besides Tagore himself, it names the following translators: Pannala Basu, Prabhat Kumar Mukherji, Sister Nivedita, E. J. Thompson and C. F. Andrews. No wonder Tagore felt uncomfortable about the varying quality of his works in English translation. In a letter to Macmillan (13 January 1915), he writes: “I am sending you some more of my stories done by various hands. They are of unequal merit and do not satisfy me. I shall depend upon you for their selection, also for corrections.” Dasgupta, A Difficult Friendship, 19.

\(^{35}\) See Lago, “Tagore in Translation,” 418.
the translators and retranslators who worked on his poems, including, and perhaps especially, Tagore himself, who could unerringly draw the line between his own and others' contributions?" ("Tagore in Translation," 418). As I have already explored in my discussion of authorship and authenticity in chapter 2, the unease expressed by Lago and others suggests that readers in most reading communities want and expect to be able to unerringly draw lines between the different agents involved in the creation of a translated work; or they would rather not admit that it is actually impossible to draw those lines.

While Tagore had accepted and appreciated the help that he got from Yeats and others when he first entered the literary world of the West, this relationship with Western 'helpers' soon deteriorated for a number of reasons. It is certainly true that Tagore "courted the friendship and engagement of elite intellectuals with whom he might develop and share ideas and common experiences, and who might further his project of East-West cultural and intellectual dialogue" yet he was not willing to simply bow to every suggestion thrown his way. In the second decade of the twentieth century, none of Tagore's advisers in Europe spoke Bengali, but there were many who thought they had a better understanding of what Tagore wanted to express and they sometimes tried (and some succeeded) in pushing Tagore to change certain words and phrases. As early as 1913, Tagore seemed weary of this practice. In a letter to Thompson following a discussion regarding emendations suggested by Thompson to some of Tagore's translations, Rabindranath wrote:

The pleasure I have of polishing [the poems'] English version is of different nature [from] that of an author revising his works for publication. Every line of these should be as closely my own as possible though I must labour under the disadvantage of not being born to your language. In such a case I have to be guided by my instinct, allowing it to work almost unconsciously without being hindered by more than casual suggestions from outside. (Dutta and Robinson, Selected Letters, 132)

---

Tagore's initial stance towards the English translations of his work seems to alternate between admitting that his linguistic skills might not be up to the task and that he appreciates help, on the one hand, and the frustration that none of his advisers have direct access to the Bengali original, on the other hand: "When the meaning and music of [the] original haunts you it is difficult for you to know how much has been realized," he writes in a letter to Ezra Pound on the 5 February 1913 (106). Tagore's ambivalent feelings about translation become evident in such exchanges. Just weeks before writing to Pound, Tagore feels obliged to apologize to Yeats for some corrections "made at the instance of Mr. Andrews in Gitanjali when it was too late to submit them to [Yeats]" and expresses his hope that Yeats will revise the proofs of the second edition of the collections of poems in order to "make all the restorations [he] think[s] necessary" (105). What emerges from Tagore's correspondence quite clearly is that all of the advisers involved had their own agenda, as Lago points out:

[It is highly unlikely that free verse translations by a Bengali lyric poet could negotiate with perfect ease their passage through the hands of Yeats the Celtic revivalist, Pound the iconoclast, Sturge Moore the neo-Hellenist, Evelyn Underhill the religious mystic and Robert Bridges the austere classicist who rejected free verse and all its ways. ("Tagore in Translation," 417)³⁷

This is certainly also true of his prose translated into English: there is a significant difference in register and style between, for example, The Home and the World and Gora, translated in 1922 by William Pearson.

Tagore was also aggrieved by cynical comments about his having received the Nobel Prize simply because of Yeats's rewriting of most of the poems in Gitanjali and upset by Bridges's request to make "verbal alterations" in these poems before including them in the anthology, The Spirit of Man.³⁸ Tagore's initial refusal to have a single word changed and his frustration with the suggestions coming from very different angles about ³⁷ Evelyn Underhill's most famous work Mysticism. A Study of the Nature and Development of Man's Spiritual Consciousness (1911) was the standard work on religious and spiritual practice until 1946, when Aldous Huxley's A Perennial Philosophy was published. Underhill helped Tagore with the English translations for Songs of Kabir, published in 1915.

³⁸ See Lago 1972, 418.
how and what he should translate – in terms of poetry and other writings – have been explained by some critics as the offended sulking of a slightly arrogant man. Tagore’s temper may have played a role but when one reads his correspondence, a far more nuanced picture emerges. Less than eighteen months after the announcement of the Nobel Prize and less than three years after his sensational appearance on the English literary scene Tagore writes to William Rothenstein (letter dated 4 April 1915):

Since I have got my fame as an English writer I feel extreme reluctance in accepting alterations in my English poems by any of your writers. I must not give men any reasonable ground for accusing me – which they do – of reaping advantage [from] other men’s genius and skill. There are people who suspect that I owe in a large measure to Andrews’ help for my literary success, which is so false I can afford to laugh at it. But it is different about Yeats. I think Yeats was sparing in his suggestions – moreover, I was with him during the revisions. But one is apt to delude himself, and it is very easy for me to gradually forget the share Yeats had in making my things passable. [...] If it be true that Yeats’s touches have made it possible for Gitanjali to occupy the place it does then that must be confessed. At least by my subsequent unadulterated writing my true level should be found out and the faintest speck of lie should be wiped out from the fame that I enjoy now. It does not matter what people think of me but it does matter all the world to me to be true to myself. This is the reason why I cannot accept any help from Bridges excepting where the grammar is wrong and wrong words have been used. [...] PS: [...] In fact I am not so much anxious about mutilations as about added beauties which I cannot claim as mine. (Dutta and Robinson, Selected Letters, 162)

While Tagore initially did not object to his texts being worked on by several people, the canard about the Nobel Prize going to him mainly because of Yeats’s input drove home in no uncertain terms that asking for too much help as a writer and poet was frowned upon in the West. Instead, what was expected was an original genius of the Romantic kind. Indeed, Tagore was aware of the Western doubt regarding the authenticity of a text that was not the work of a sole person; and his gradual exclusion of people from London from the English translations should be seen in this light.

39 See Lago, “Tagore in Translation,” 418: “Valentine Chirol, in India in 1913 with a Royal Commission, was reported to have said in a mischievous speech to an assembly of Bengali Muslims that Tagore had won the Prize only because Yeats rewrote the poems. Tagore never forgot this canard.”

By 1921, Tagore was quite disillusioned with the difficulties involved in the self-translations and their reception. In a letter to Thompson in 1921, he wrote: "I know I am misrepresenting myself as a poet to the western readers. But when I began this career of falsifying my own coins I did it in play. Now I am becoming frightened of its enormity and I am willing to make a confession of my misdeeds and withdraw into my original vocation as a mere Bengali poet" (Dutta and Robinson, Selected Letters, 254).40

Also, Tagore’s relationship with Macmillan was becoming more and more strained and would basically come to a halt by 1925. The person in charge of proofreading and approving of the translations of Tagore’s work was Charles Whibley (1859-1930), a journalist, critic and reader for the publishing house. He had no knowledge of Bengali at all but expressed doubts about the rapidity with which the translations reached him and the poor quality of most of them.41 At the same time, because he did not read Bengali himself, Whibley did not feel in a position to help Tagore; and the translations were published with his and Macmillan’s blessing.

Overall then, there were a variety of factors that contributed to the editing and translating choices not only of The Home and the World, but of all works by Tagore translated into English. Trying to adapt texts with a foreign audience in mind (the English readership naturally is foreign to Tagore to a degree) means labouring under certain assumptions of what will be acceptable and what will not to the target audience. Not knowing to whom to turn for qualified help played a role, as well as did assumptions about authorship and authenticity in the West. Tagore was aware of the expectations that the European readership (both the intellectual elite and the general readers) had of an author. He was torn between wanting to fulfil these expectations and needing help with the translations and editing process. With hindsight, both Tagore and his publishers made doubtful choices. However, as stressed above, their choices are not enough to explain why the first Asian Nobel Prize winner sank into oblivion in the English-speaking West.

40 On Tagore’s exchange of letters with a variety of prominent members of the Western elite and the resulting misunderstandings, see Michael Collins, Empire, Nationalism and the Postcolonial World: Rabindranath Tagore’s Writings on History, Politics and Society, Edinburgh South Asian Studies Series (London: Routledge, 2011). Collins also provides an insight into the difficulties of cross-cultural understanding in “Rabindranath Tagore and the Politics of Friendship.”

41 In a letter to Macmillan, Whibley writes: "I confess that there seems a danger of Tagore’s spoiling his market by overproduction […] What become of the legend of the exclusive and secluded poet?" Quoted in Mary M. Lago, "India’s Prisoner": A Biography of Edward John Thompson, 1886-1946 (Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2001), 112.

By the time Tagore decided to publish Ghare Baire in English, he was not only fed up with comments and suggestions coming from London from people who claimed to have his best interest in mind but were actually following their personal agenda. He was also involved in the establishment of Vishva-Bharati, the university at Santiniketan, and worried about the political unrest in Bengal. 1919 is not only the year the book was published in English but also the year Tagore repudiated his knighthood after the Jallianwalla Bagh Massacre. His decision to have a novel translated may have been prompted by frustrations when it came to poetry translations and by the wish to show Western readers another side to the mystic poet and the public speaker focussing on spirituality and universalism.

Shifts in critical perception

The reception of The Home and the World needs to be put in context and contrasted with the initial reception of Tagore’s Gitanjali in 1913. As Radice

---

42 The massacre is more famously known as Amritsar Massacre. On the massacre, see Stanley A. Wolpert, A New History of India (New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009), 751-52. On May 30, 1919, Tagore wrote the following letter to the Viceroy. The letter appeared in The Statesman on 3 June 1919: “Your Excellency, The enormity of the measures taken by the Government in the Punjab for quelling some local disturbances has, with a rude shock, revealed to our minds the helplessness of our position as British subjects in India. The disproportionate severity of the punishments inflicted upon the unfortunate people and the methods of carrying them out, we are convinced, are without parallel in the history of civilized governments, barring some conspicuous exceptions, recent and remote. Considering that such treatment has been meted out to a population, disarmed and resourceless, by a power which has the most terribly efficient organization for destruction of human lives, we must strongly assert that it can claim no political expediency, far less moral justification. [...] The time has come when badges of honour make our shame glaring in the incongruous context of humiliation, and I for my part, wish to stand, shorn, of all special distinctions, by the side of those of my countrymen who, for their so called insignificance, are liable to suffer degradation not fit for human beings. And these are the reasons which have compelled me to ask Your Excellency, with due reference and regret, to relieve me of my title of knighthood, which I had the honour to accept from His Majesty the King at the hands of your predecessor, for whose nobleness of heart I still entertain great admiration.” For the full letter, see The English Writings of Rabindranath Tagore, ed. Sisir Kumar Das (New Delhi: Sahitya Akademi,1996), 751-2. points out, the moment of Tagore’s introduction to the West was characterized by a feeling of restlessness and disorientation, a feeling that worked in Tagore’s favour:

With the huge success of Gitanjali, it became apparent that many readers in Britain were tired of the cynicism of Oscar Wilde, embarrassed by the imperialism of Kipling, baffled by the experiments of early modernism: they wanted a different sort of writer, and judging by the response of the Nobel Prize Committee and the explosion in sales of secondary translations of Gitanjali across the world, it seems that many readers in other countries, in the frightening and disillusioning context of the First World War and its aftermath, wanted a new, sincere, beautiful, spiritual sort of writer too. (Radice, “Tagore the World Over,” para. 7)

Because spirituality was the first and foremost quality that readers in the West recognized in Tagore, that is what they were looking for in his other writings, as well. Tagore did contribute to the initial image of his poetry being universal and spiritual: in an effort to make his poetry more accessible, he discarded much of the local and political. The historical moment was favourable to that particular kind of reception. The influential members of the intellectual elite responsible for Tagore’s initial consecration in London all were attracted to Tagore for very specific reasons; whether they saw parallels between Bengal and Ireland (Yeats), looked for inspiration in Eastern mysticism (Underhill) or were interested in exchanges about prosody and other poetic devices (Moore and Pound). Convinced of Tagore’s greatness (although they arrived at that judgment via different routes) “it was their reading of the Bengali poet and his culture that set the tone on the chorus of Western adulation of Tagore.” However, it soon

---

43 In an article written in 1918, Professor C. H. Hereford explains Tagore’s initial reception in similar terms: “The literary and intellectual atmosphere here, in and after 1900, was stirred by a variety of influences which made for the welcome of one who brought the promise of a spiritual renaissance and conveyed it in an elusively delicate English style. […] Reaction from the robust directness of realism had given a vogue to suggestion, reticence, and symbol. On the ethical side, the cult of Tolstoy and of St. Francis subtly prepared for and coloured the reception of the Indian poet.” C. H. Hereford, “Rabindranath Tagore and His Work,” The Manchester Guardian, 28 March 1918. Reprinted in Kundu et al., Imagining Tagore: Rabindranath and the British Press, 1912-1941, 308.

44 Ana Jelnikar, “W. B. Yeats’s (Mis)Reading of Tagore: Interpreting an Alien Culture,” University of Toronto Quarterly 77, no. 4 (2008), 1005-25. Here 1006. This is a lucid became clear that the image of Tagore as serene and spiritual Oriental did not correspond to the historical, ‘real’ Tagore: a man in his fifties with a literary career that spanned more than thirty years who seemed to ignore good advice about his imperfect English and who also had quite distinct political ideas, as emerged after the Jallianwalla Bagh massacre. Ezra Pound’s reaction to Tagore singing Sonar bangla (Golden Bengal) provides a glance into why the political background to the plot of The Home and the World did not seem very credible to most Anglo-American readers.

Pound almost understood it as a highly emotional patriotic rallying song: “It is ‘minor’ and subjective. Yet it has all the properties of action.” But he fell in with the political assumption that an Asian country cannot (or should not) possess a concept of nationhood: “Sonar bangla”, he wrote, “must be the Bengalis ‘Marseillaise’, if an oriental nation can be said to have an equivalent to such an anthem.” (Lago, “India’s Prisoner,” 88-89)

The Home and the World was received with mixed feelings in the Anglo-American intellectual elite of the time. Yeats had cautious praises for this novel and Tagore’s autobiography but was disappointed in what he felt were poor translations of Tagore’s poems. By 1935, his initial infatuation with Tagore had vanished completely:

Damn Tagore! We got out three good books, Sturge Moore and I, and then, because he thought it more important to know English than to be a great poet, he brought out sentimental rubbish and wrecked his reputation. Tagore does not know English, no Indian knows English. Nobody can write with music and style in a language not learned in childhood and ever since the language of his thought.

Besides Edward Thompson, Evelyn Underhill, some of her fellow mystics and a few members of the India Society, nobody who had been very vocal about Tagore’s genius and talent paid the literary output of the Bengali account of the manner in which specific politico-historical forces at work between 1912 and 1935 encroached on the relationship between Tagore and Yeats.

---

writer much heed after 1920. The language of the translations was awkwardly Victorian, the topics often lacked mysticism and otherworldliness, and the reviews were cruel.

E. M. Forster is very harsh in his judgment of The Home and the World. Although he finds the theme “beautiful,” he also states: “Throughout the book one is puzzled by bad tastes that verge upon bad taste.” He calls Bimala’s and Sandip’s mutual attraction a “simple boarding-house flirtation,” completely ignoring that what might appear an innocuous flirt in England was thought to be outrageous in India, as the first reactions in Bengal clearly show. Most of all, Forster deplores the language, which he refers to as “Babu sentences.” Forster is quick in blaming the translation for his dislike of the novel: “Was there some rococo charm that vanished in translation, or is it an experiment that has not quite come off?” Forster concludes that this must be a failed experiment. Clearly, Forster could not relate to the text, as it was not responding to his expectations. Reception theory elucidates what happens in cases such as this: “There are two ways of rethinking your reading experiences when a text fails to respond to the strategies with which it is approached: you can keep the text and change the strategy, or you can keep the strategy and toss out the text on the assumption that it is thin or incoherent” (Rabinowitz, Before Reading, 211). Forster did the latter: he tossed the text out. And so did many readers in the Anglo-American world. Because they had a very narrow image of Tagore, it was difficult to classify The Home and the World alongside his more 'spiritual' and 'universal' writing.

---

47 A derivation of bapu (father), the term babu is used in India to express respect towards men. However, Forster is here referring to the then current deprecating usage of the word amongst British citizens to describe Indian clerks who wrote and spoke a distinctly ‘Indian’ English.

49 Krishna Dutta and Andrew Robinson, Rabindranath Tagore: The Myriad-Minded Man (London: Tauris Parke Paperbacks, 2nd ed., 2009). The standard Tagore biography until then had been Krishna Kripalani Rabindranath Tagore: A Biography (Visva Bharati: Calcutta 1980. First edition 1962). Both of these biographies have been accused of being biased: “Kripalani’s biography […] is one of the most flawed biographies of Tagore in man, Tagore wrote poetry, novels, plays and essays; he composed music and was a painter as well. He is credited with introducing the genre of the short story to Bengal and with shaping a new, modern literary language. On a socio-political level, Tagore advocated education and rural development. However, the West was not interested in the polymath Tagore, but only in the 'wise man from the Orient.' To many, the Bengali writer was the personification of Eastern philosophy and mysticism – hardly more than that. As Radice writes, "[i]n Tagore's lifetime, quite a lot can be attributed to his extraordinary aura and charisma. When people met him, they felt – as with Mahatma Gandhi – that they were in the presence of someone of immense inner balance and self-control." Once Tagore no longer travelled the world, the infatuation caused by his aura and charisma waned.

Changes in literary aesthetics

Substantial changes in literary taste are another influential reason why Tagore nearly became a non-entity in the West. When Tagore first came to London, the circles he frequented projected a certain image of him that would not outlive the initial hype. Invited by the India Society that had been founded in London in 1910, Tagore became friends with Yeats but also with Evelyn Underhill, an exponent of British mysticism. Tagore's most fervent circulation, stressing Tagore's alleged, though unsubstantiated, western learnings in a wholly unwarranted and unqualified way." Michael Collins, "Rabindranath Tagore and Nationalism: An Interpretation," Heidelberg Papers in South Asian and Comparative Politics Working Paper No. 42 (2008): 1-37. Here 32n164. Ketaki Kushari Dyson is critical of the Dutta/Robinson biography: "Dutta and Robinson had a splendid opportunity to project an accurate and comprehensive picture of Tagore to English-reading audiences, but they did not make real use of that opportunity, and ironically, their book encouraged some of those very misconceptions about Tagore, and undervaluations of his achievements." Ketaki Kushari Dyson, "Rumbling Empires and Men Speaking to Storms." Available online: http://www.parabaas.com/rabindranath/articles/brKetaki Collins.html. Last accessed 11 September 2012. For another, more concise and more recent biography of Tagore, see Uma Das Gupta, Rabindranath Tagore: A Biography (New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 2004).

While it is by now a commonplace that it was Rabindranath who introduced the short story into the Bengali canon, Susan Stanford Friedman points out that his sister Swarnakumari Devi "published her volume of short stories before Tagore wrote any." Susan Stanford Friedman, "Towards a Transnational Turn in Narrative Theory: Literary Narratives, Traveling Tropes, and the Case of Virginia Woolf and the Tagores," Narrative 19, no. 1 (2011): 1-32. Here 13.

admirer and sponsor in Germany was Count Hermann Keyserling who had founded the Schule der Weisheit (School of Wisdom) in Darmstadt. Very much of the excitement around Tagore was primarily about his person and persona, created in his lectures on universalism and world peace, secondarily about the spiritual poetry in the line of Gitanjali, some plays and Tagore's essays based on his lecture tours, and only thirdly about his other writings that did not fit the spiritual and inspirational category.

As Lago points out, literary tastes were already changing by 1925 (which is when Macmillan stopped publishing new works by Tagore):

> The bittersweet pastorales of the Georgian poets were replaced by a poetry of the here and now. [...] Fictional sprawl was more and more frowned upon. Theatergoers demanded plays with contemporary interest. Now Tagore's delicate allegorical verse plays, his poems still in the Gitanjali vein, his fiction in which the Babu English seemed barely forced under by an editorial hand, struck many readers as dated and unfocused. ("Tagore in Translation," 421)

Soon after his own death, the remaining few faithful friends in the West passed away, as well: Underhill in 1941, Thompson and Keyserling in 1946. What was left were truncated translations and nobody capable of or interested in retranslating what seemed outdated and irrelevant to Western concerns in the aftermath of the Second World War. In the following decades, literary criticism would further move away from all Tagore was thought to represent, emphasizing the close reading of texts and raising the text above generalizing discussion and speculation about either authorial intention or social context. Someone like Tagore, who in Britain and in the United States was known mainly for the persona of 'the wise man from the East', did not raise much interest between 1930 and 1980. Most of his works sank into oblivion.

Was this true of other European countries, as well? All initial translations into European languages base themselves on the English translation as there simply were no Europeans fluent enough in Bengali to attempt a translation from the original language. How did these agents involved in introducing Tagore into their culture present the text twice removed from the original and the writer himself?

Translating the ‘English’ Tagore into other European languages and cultures

The majority of first translations of the works by Tagore into other European languages relied on the English text rather than the Bengali original. The latest French edition of The Home and the World, dating from 2002, for example, is a reprint of the 1921 French translation of the 1919 English translation. The same is true for the German editions of Das Heim und die Welt. Originally published by the Kurt Wolff Verlag in Munich, the first translation by Helene Meyer-Franck was used for the following editions (second edition in 1961, third edition in 1978 and fourth edition in 1984, all published by the Volk und Welt Verlag in East Berlin). The use of a translation based on the 1919 English text did not, however, impair the reception of Tagore in other countries.

Maybe instinctively and unconsciously [Tagore] hit on a style that would enable his reputation to spread rapidly not only in the English-speaking world but elsewhere, because the style was very easy to translate into other languages. Universal in his imaginative reach, strongly impelled to speak for and to all humankind and not just to his fellow Bengalis, Tagore found in his English translation style a perfect vehicle for worldwide transmission. In recent years I have looked at translations of Gitanjali and other English books by Tagore in many languages: German, French, Spanish, Italian, Dutch, Swedish. They are all very faithful to the original, which in every case was the English version, not the original Bengali. This was true even of translations into Hindi, Tamil and other Indian languages with the honourable exception of Gujarati; where translators had eagerly started to translate Tagore directly from Bengali before he won the Nobel Prize. (Radice, “Tagore the World Over,” para. 8)

Before we deal with the specific reception of The Home and the World, I would like to give an example of a highly effective translation twice removed from the original.

---

Tagore in Spanish

In “The Invention of an Andalusian Tagore” Howard Young explores the reasons for “Tagore’s fortunes in the Spanish-speaking world [which] defy simple summarization.” This has to do with Spanish Orientalism, very much en vogue at the time, but more importantly it has to do with the fact that Juan Ramón Jiménez and his wife Zenobia decided to translate Tagore into Spanish. In Young’s opinion, Tagore may have found one of his most sympathetic translators in Jiménez. Nonetheless, Young quickly adds that the Spanish translations “unwittingly helped contribute to the process of distorting Tagore, begun by the Bengali poet himself in his autotranslations” (“Invention,” 42). However, these “distortions” did not harm Tagore’s reception and fortune in Spain. Jiménez did not translate The Home and the World (which remained untranslated until the 1970s) but twenty-two other Tagore titles, among them Gitanjali, between 1913 and 1922. Some of these collections were revised in the 1930s. All translations bore Zenobia’s name (or, rather, her initials), and as of 1918, they all sported a frontispiece that read: “Unico traductor autorizado por Rabindranath Tagore para publicar sus obras en español.” Again, we have got a preoccupation with authority and authenticity in light of a multiplication of voices in translation. Jiménez’s translations might have been “distortions” but “for decades, the Jiménez version of Tagore was Tagore for the vast Spanish-speaking world, functioning as the original, even though the original in this case was an English rewrite of Bengali” (Young, “Invention,” 45). When Tagore rewrote his Bengali poems in English, he opted for prose rather than verse and simplified the ornate language of the original. Jiménez did not speak English himself and thus had no direct access to the poems. His wife did, and so she would “prepare a straightforward Spanish version that rigidly followed Tagore’s word order and format” in English (46). Then Jiménez would make this literal translation into a poem to his liking. This process:

---

changes from interlingual, or translation proper, to intralingual, a rewording or working with signs in the same language. By paying particular attention to the rhythmic possibilities of Spanish prosody and exercising his own choices in diction, based on the conventions of European symbolism and on the writings of the Spanish Romantic poet Becquer, Juan Ramón [Jiménez] turned out the published version. (46)

From a traditional Western point of view that values authenticity of texts and considers them to be the property of a single author, this practice of translation seems disreputable. Whether one agrees with this practice or not, the outcome was indeed very successful. Jiménez’s translations were so effective at meeting the aesthetic expectations of readers that Tagore remained an important author in Spain, and all other Spanish-speaking regions, especially South America, regularly published all through the twentieth century, at a time when he was as good as forgotten in the English-speaking countries in the West.

The success of Tagore’s poetry in the Spanish-speaking world completely overshadows the novel which did not attract very many followers. The Home and the World, for example, went untranslated until the 1970s. While the novel was out of print for several years (the last imprint dates back to 1994), an independent Spanish publisher from Barcelona will be launching a new edition of the novel at the end of October 2012.\(^{57}\)

Tagore in Portuguese

The case of the Portuguese translation of The Home and the World is different from other European languages as even the first translation was made directly from Bengali. It also shows yet again how the efforts of a single individual can shape the reception of a literary work.

A casa e o Mundo was translated by the Goan writer Telo de Mascarenhas (1899-1979) and published in 1941 by the Lisbon publishing house Editorial Inquirito. It would see four editions in fourteen years. De Mascarenhas had founded the Centro Nacionalista Hindu in Lisbon in 1926 and saw the translations of modern Indian literature as acts of passive resistance towards the Portuguese colonial power and as a way to create a cultural pan-Lusitanian identity separate from the Portuguese Empire. In 1928 de Mascarenhas wrote an article on Tagore’s views of nationalism in which he stressed the importance of Ghare Baire as a discussion of patriotism and nationalism rather than as the depiction of an unhappy love triangle.

The translation strategies are noteworthy: in a similar move to the English translation, the Portuguese translation is also divided into chapters (albeit thirteen rather than the twelve in Surendranath’s translation) and de Mascarenhas has also decided not to translate certain parts of the text.58

Overall, the Portuguese reception of Tagore inserts itself within the efforts of the literary elite that believed in the necessity to actively shape political life. These efforts first resulted in the formation of Renascença Portuguesa, a literary association established in Oporto in 1910, and the Grupo da Biblioteca, which existed from 1919 to 1927. Political involvement was also important to the intellectuals contributing to the critical review Seara Nova (New Cornfield), founded by Jaime Cortesão, Raul Proença, Aquilino Ribeiro and Câmara Reys and published twice monthly from 15 October, 1921. Despite censorship, shortage of money and frequent arguments among the contributors, the review survived for decades and can count many Portuguese writers amongst its contributors, notably José Saramago and Luiz Francisco Rebello.59 Sovon Sanyal argues that these Portuguese intellectuals were “attracted by Tagore’s universalism and search for unity of mankind in the midst of the all round spread of fascist doctrines in Europe. [...] Transcending all narrow racial, religious and national boundaries, Tagore emerged for them as a true internationalist” (“A Casa E O Mundo,” para. 8). In a politico-cultural environment favourable to the message of Tagore’s political novels, The Home and the World remained more visible to Portuguese readers over the decades than it was in the English-speaking West.

Tagore in German

In Germany, The Home and the World became one of Tagore’s best-known books. The German translation of The Home and the World by Helene Meyer-Franck for the publisher Kurt Wolff in 1920 is called Das Heim und die Welt. By then, Wolff was a fervent promoter of Tagore, even though he was not immediately impressed by his literary genius according to an anecdote concerning the German publication of Gitanjali. This anecdote is worth telling as it shows the power struggle between different agents in the literary polysystem. Willy Haas recounts that only one reader report was positive about Tagore’s poems and that, as a consequence, Wolff had decided not to publish the collection. He had already asked for the manuscript to be sent back when he heard that Tagore had been awarded the Nobel Prize. To everyone’s great relief, the manuscript had not left the local post office yet and the publication of the bestseller brought in a considerable profit.60 In his recent publications on Tagore’s impact on Germany, Martin Kämpchen has gathered the recollections of other people involved in the Wolff publishing house at the time which contradict Haas’s version. In several letters as well as in an essay written for a radio programme in 1962, Kurt Wolff states that he had accepted Tagore’s book shortly before the news of the Nobel Prize reached him. Kurt Pinthus, a reader at the publishing house, as well as another employee, Arthur Seiffhart, both recall events in a similar fashion to Wolff. Kämpchen also found evidence that Haas may actually have joined the publisher only in the spring of 1914 which would mean that he could not have been present to witness events surrounding the acceptance or rejection of the manuscript in the first place ("Tagore und Deutschland," 14-8). But let us return to the German translation of The Home and the World.

Das Heim und die Welt clearly states that it is the "einzig autorisierte deutsche Ausgabe. Nach der von Rabindranath Tagore selbst veranstalteten englischen Ausgabe ins Deutsche übertragen" (The only authorized German edition. Translated from the English version of the novel written by Rabindranath Tagore himself). Not only do we notice the preoccupation with the author's authorization but the English version also only names Surendranath Tagore as the translator. Why would the German translator and/or the publisher decide to mislead their readers into believing that Tagore had single-handedly prepared the English translation? They must have felt that the German readership would worry about the authenticity of a translation twice removed from the original – which is why they stressed that theirs was the only authorized translation. Moreover, if readers believed that Tagore had himself authored the English version of The Home and the World, then that text had the status of an original and therefore a German translation, once removed from the original, would be perceived as more faithful, more valuable and thus more authentic than a translation twice removed from the original.

One of the earlier critics of the novel writing in German was Gyorgy Lukács. In the early 1920s, Lukács expresses a similar view to Forster's in his review of the German translation of The Home and the World, entitled "Tagore's Ghandi Novel." Lukács claims that "Tagore's enormous popularity among Germany's intellectual 'elite' is one of the cultural scandals occurring with ever greater intensity again and again." The novel is described as "a petit bourgeois yarn of the shoddiest kind" and Tagore himself as "a wholly insignificant figure [...] whose creative powers do not even stretch to a decent pamphlet. He lacks the imagination even to calumniate convincingly and effectively" ("Tagore's Ghandi Novel," 8-11). One of the most influential Marxist literary critics at that time, Lukács approaches the text with a whole set of assumptions and expectations: he reads the novel looking for a clearly expressed political statement and thus finds nothing worthy in it, completely ignoring its psychological aspects and its genre (novel of ideas). When it comes to European writers, Lukács will occasionally admit that art does not always have to be political (as he does when talking about Dostoyevsky and Strindberg) but when confronted with The Home and the World, he expects Tagore to make a stronger political statement. As the novel does not correspond to his expectations, in a strategy clearly described by Rabinowitz, he thinks the novel to be thin and incoherent.

Das Heim und die Welt saw four editions between 1920 and 1984 – the last three in East Germany. The Volk und Welt publishing house was founded in 1947 and was the second most important publishing house in the GDR. Its initial aim was to publish Soviet literature in translation as well as anti-Fascist German literature. In the 1950s, the focus shifted to international writers. Over the decades, Volk und Welt included publications by forty Nobel Prize winners; Rabindranath Tagore was one of them. Some people in the publishing house put Tagore’s name forward as one of the authors who should be included, probably because his work can be read as anti-Imperialist and qualifies as ‘oppressed minority’ literature. However, the decision whether to publish the novel or not ultimately was not up to them. Other members of the cultural elite in the GDR were not quite sure about Tagore. Das Heim und die Welt had to get the official approval by one of the ‘Hauptgutachter’ (a sort of chief monitor) in the ministry of culture, Paul Friedländer, who was in charge of manuscripts considered potentially compatible with SED party politics. Friedländer was famous for a high rate of rejection, and in this case he managed to block the publication of Das

Heim und die Welt for three whole years.\textsuperscript{64} Although the novel saw four editions and was widely read, some members of the intellectual elite were not convinced that the political message of the novel was concordant with the cultural policy of GDR and Soviet literature.

Several works by Tagore were published on a fairly regular basis in the Federal Republic of Germany between 1920 until 1980: aphorisms, some poems and short stories. Indologists working in West and East Germany (at, for example, the South Asia Institute at the University of Heidelberg, the South Asia Institute at the Humboldt University in Berlin or the Südasien-Seminar at the Orientalisches Institut at the Martin-Luther university at Halle-Wittenberg) reminded and keep reminding the German public of the importance of Tagore. Again, a few prominent agents stand out in the struggle to maintain a certain level of visibility of Tagore’s work, individuals who managed to interest the larger public in the Bengali writer. Martin Kämpchen is one of the most prominent figures both in terms of translation and Tagore criticism.\textsuperscript{65} In East Germany, Gisela Leiste also translated directly from Bengali. There is a new translation of Gora by Leiste that dates back to 2004 but The Home and the World is currently out of print in Germany – while it seems to be more en vogue in the English-speaking West.

Tagore in Hungarian, Slovenian and Croatian

Imre Bangha argues that “Tagore’s popularity in [East Central Europe] came in three waves between which there were periods of amnesia.”\textsuperscript{66} The first wave started with the awarding of the Nobel Prize. What is worth mentioning

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{65} Besides the titles mentioned above, Kämpchen has also published Rabindranath Tagore and Germany: A Documentation (Calcutta: Goethe-Institut, 1991).
\item \textsuperscript{66} Imre Bangha, “From 82-Year-Old Musicologist to Anti-Imperialist Hero: Metamorphoses of the Hungarian Tagore in East Central Europe,” Asian and African Studies: Rabindranath Tagore and his Legacy for the World Today 14, no. 1 (2010): 57-70. Here 58. Bangha refers to several studies on the reception of Tagore in Russia, Bulgaria and Romania which seem to confirm that, there too, the interest in Tagore manifested itself in three waves.
\end{itemize}
\end{footnotesize}
in this regard is the reaction in the Balkan regions that formerly belonged to the Austrian-Hungarian Empire. As Ana Jelnikar shows, the initial response was “largely dominated by extra-literary factors rather than any authentic appreciation of the writer’s sensibility.” There was a relief amongst the Slovene intelligentsia that the Nobel did not go to Peter Rosegger, “whose name [...] was associated less with literary credentials than with an aggressive Germanization policy pursued against Slovenes in Southern Carinthia and Southern Styria” (Jelnikar, “Kosovel and Tagore,” 83-84). As a counter-example to the narrow-minded nationalist Rosegger, Tagore was praised for his universalism and spirituality.

The second wave lasted from the end of the First World War until the late 1920s, peaking in Tagore’s visits to the region in 1926. The third wave came with the rediscovery of Tagore in 1955 and his celebration as “an anti-imperialist hero in the communist block” (Bangha, “Hungarian Tagore,” 58). In this last wave of popularity, we see a clear link in the cultural politics of the communist countries: like in East Germany, Tagore was celebrated in Hungary and Yugoslavia. The Home and the World was anonymously translated from English into Croatian in 1922 and published serially, before Miroslav Golik retranslated the novel in 1944. (Gönc Moačanin, “Tagore’s Work in Croatia,” 73). There are several recent Croatian translations of Tagore’s poetry and short stories by Clara Gönc Moačanin, not directly from the Bengali but based on Radice’s retranslations into English.

On one side of the Iron Curtain, Tagore was described as a “fierce enemy of petrified traditions and of fascism” and a “friend of the Soviet Union, and a vociferous critic of British imperial oppression,” and was thus portrayed as an anti-capitalist, anti-imperialist writer. The Home and the World seemed to fit the political agenda and was therefore made widely available at a time when it was out of print in the English-speaking West.

---

As emerges from this brief overview, a combination of factors and agents kept Tagore more visible in several European countries than in the English-speaking West. Let us now return to The Home and the World in English translation.

Arguing for a specific translation – paratextual engagement with authenticity

As I have mentioned at the beginning of this chapter, The Home and the World is currently available in its first 1919 translation as well as in two new translations. In this section, I concentrate on the paratextual apparatus in the three English translations available to date: Surendranath’s translation (1919, 1985, 2005); Nivedita Sen’s translation for Srishti (2004) and Sreejata Guha’s for Penguin India (2005). In this particular analysis, I am interested in the different agents whose voices we can hear in the paratext and in their hermeneutical and rhetorical skills: how do they make sense of literature (their interpretation of the text) and how do they make sense to others (how do they persuade the readers of the value and validity of the translation in question)?

As pointed out above, Penguin UK opted not to commission a new translation for one very specific reason: Tagore’s possible involvement in the translation. Let me quote from William Radice’s preface:

> In a letter to Macmillan of 5 November 1918, he wrote: “My nephew Surendranath has translated the latest novel of mine which I think you will find fully acceptable. A large part of it I have done myself and it has been carefully revised.” This gives the translation an enhanced authenticity, as Tagore was by no means so attentive to Macmillan’s editions of his other novels and collections of short stories. (Radice, “Preface,” viii)

If Rabindranath’s involvement makes the translation more authentic, do we actually need a new translation? Not according to the paratextual commentary provided by Radice in the Penguin UK edition:

> In recent years, critics with access to both languages have become more respectful of Surendranath’s achievement, more aware of what a challenge the Bengali text presents to any translator, more willing to read his English not as 'dated' but as representative of its provenance and period. [...] It is a highly sophisticated piece of work, deserving respect, not patronage. (xiii-ix)

And Anita Desai has the following to say in her introduction:

Doubtless a more modern and colloquial translation could be made to suit the altered tastes of the times, but the truth is that Bengali is a highly rhetorical language. Bengalis are given to impassioned and extravagant speech as they are to radical politics, and Tagore wrote political essays from which he took whole sentences to place in the mouth of the central character, Nikhil. Clearly, it was to him a natural, not a contrived or literary, language. It belonged to its period, the Victorian. It was of a piece with such architecture as the Victoria Terminus in Bombay, and with the dark, looming furniture, fussy costumes and domestic trappings of that age, and must be seen in this context.²⁰

The implication is that if one retranslates the text, it will be taken out of that Victorian context and this would result in the text losing authenticity. William Radice also claims that "the translation itself has classic status and is unlikely to be wholly supplanted by a new translation." What the 1919 translation should be used for then is "closer comparison of the two texts than has been attempted even by Bengali specialists in English" (Radice, "Preface," xiii). Surendranath's translation, Radice argues, is so complex that there is enough scope for research as it is. This is a view that Radice takes when it comes to all of the first translations of Tagore's work. He urges us to "see [the initial translations done and supervised by Tagore] as part of his total œuvre, and a very important and lasting part because unlike translations by others – which can date and be replaced – Tagore's translations are his own words, and as such are as durable and authentic as his writings in Bengali" (Radice, "Tagore the World Over," para. 9). So how do we read these first, faulty translations? Radice suggests we do so sympathetically, not with constant reference to the original (a pointless exercise) but as self-standing literary creations in their own right. Critics such as Sukanta Chaudhuri or Sisir Kumar Das (editor of the Sahitya Akademi’s English writings of Tagore) prefer not to see his translations as translations at all. Instead, they see him as a ‘bilingual writer’, whose ‘translations’ can be read as a sort of commentary on his Bengali works. (para. 10)

Yet, there seems an overall trend to retranslate Tagore, a trend that is being led by Indian translators. This is also true for The Home and the World. The same year Penguin UK published the first translation complete with paratextual commentary that argues for the validity of this particular text, Penguin India published a new translation of the novel by Sreejata Guha, with an introduction and notes by Swagato Ganguly. And the previous year, 2004, saw the publication of Nivedita Sen’s translation for Srishti Publishers.

The retranslation of works by Tagore in India has been prompted by the decision of several Indian universities in the late 1990s to start teaching a range of literary texts by Indian writers in English translation. The 1919 translation of The Home and the World was one of the texts on the syllabus; three collections of critical essays in English on Tagore’s novel have appeared since 2001. While the essay collections refer to the prescribed 1919 translation on the syllabus, by now, many Indian universities use one of the two new translations of Tagore’s novel. If in Indian academia and in the Indian publishing industry there persisted a similar deferential attitude towards the author as possible translator as emerges in the choices of William Radice and the Penguin UK editors, we would not have these two new translations.

---

73 For example, the Department of History at the University of Delhi has prescribed Sen’s translation for an M.A. course on Modern Indian History and it is used in Kolkata in one of its M.Phil courses in Comparative Literature. Veer Narmad South Gujarat University has prescribed Guha’s translation for a section of their MA programme in English.
What arguments are presented to the reader in the paratextual apparatus of the 2004 and 2005 translations? Quite predictably, neither the Penguin nor the Srishti text mention Rabindranath’s professed involvement in the translation. The blame is laid on Surendranath, the named translator, for what is considered an incomplete, defective translation. In her “Translator’s Note,” Nivedita Sen states that she “found Surendranath Tagore’s translation inadequate not only because it leaves out some of the virtually untranslatable poetic prose; it also does away with important textual matter.” However, she also admits: “Although it is easy enough to dismiss Surendranath Tagore’s translation as archaic or incomplete, it is not as easy to render the entire original text in a reader-friendly idiom” (Sen, “Translator’s Note,” 312). Here, the translator is in good company: as I have pointed out above, many Tagore scholars have deplored the differences in register, content and structure between the Bengali and English versions of Tagore’s work. In the second quote, we also have got an echo of what both Radice and Desai say about the difficulties of translation from Bengali, and of translating Tagore in particular.

Similarly, the “Publisher’s Note” in the Penguin translation informs us that, in the 1919 translation

Surendranath Tagore chose to leave out chunks of the poetic prose that Ghare Baire is embellished with, as well as some of the poetry written in the form of Vaishnava Padavalis, perhaps deeming these untranslatable. His translation also left out textual matter that is important to understanding the nuances of the characters, and collapsed Nikhilesh’s two sisters-in-law into one. This new translation provides an English version of the full text of Rabindranath Tagore’s Ghare Baire, and attempts to replicate the language of the original, with all its complexities, as closely as possible.²⁵

---

²⁴ Vaishnava is a form of devotion to Vishnu, a supreme deity who can also take human form of Krishna, that peaked in the sixteenth century. At the centre of the surge of Krishna devotion was the Brahman Chaitanya (1486-1533). Devotion is shown in songs, kirtan, which can be roughly distinguished into four groups: samkirtan (group singing), nam-kirtan (names of God), padavali kirtan (lyrical hymns) and lila-kirtan (dramatic performance of theme-related songs). The term padavali, also transliterated as padaabali or padaboli, literally means “gathering of songs.” See Joseph T. O’Connell, “Tracing Vaishnava Strains in Tagore,” The Journal of Hindu Studies 4, no. 2 (2011): 144-64. Here 146-48.

The distinct rhetorical strategies at work are clearly visible: no mention of the author's professed involvement in the textual interventions that make the 1919 translation what it is and an avowal that the translation on hand is more faithful to the original in a philological sense, a more genuine article than Surendranath's efforts. Interestingly, all agents involved, whether sitting in India or in Europe, play one and the same trump card. That trump card is called authenticity. In all three translations an argument is made for that particular text possessing authenticity, or even enhanced authenticity. But which translation is more authentic: Surendranath Tagore's because of the author's professed involvement, or Sen's and/or Guha's translations which stick more closely to the Bengali original? Is authenticity linked to a single author? Does it mean faithfulness to an original text (however defined) in a philological sense? Who or what guarantees authenticity? And, perhaps more importantly, who decides that authenticity is one of the foremost attributes of literature? Why is the return to the 'original' described in terms of purification, whether with regard to the logic of arguments and semantics or with regard to what is to be understood as the form intended by the author? And why are translators who explicitly advocate postcolonial and poststructuralist translation techniques still reassuring their readers that their translation is as close to the original as a translation could possibly be?

There is a discrepancy between the rhetoric presented to the readers in the paratext ('this is a text nearly as good as the original') and a critical discourse superimposed onto the act of translation that emerged from my personal contact with the two translators. I asked the translators about their stance on the relationship between original and target texts and for their opinions about the 'authenticity claim' made by Radice and Desai about Surendranath's version. Nivedita Sen had the following to say:

Those of us who have engaged with [Surendranath's translation] as teachers often wonder how [Rabindranath] could have advocated or approved of the deletion of important passages that leave the novel high and dry. The entire theory of Nikhilash, focusing on his realization that there is a whole world of suffering people whose problems are not solved by the slogans and mindless violence of nationalism, gets sidetracked, deflected, often erased from that text. There could have been some complex reason connected with [Rabindranath’s] concern that his foreign audience should not know too much about people like Ponchu whose suffering he thought we might not be able to alleviate irrespective of whether we gained our independence from colonial rule. This is indeed a grey area, but if that translation was tailored according to his instructions, there must have been some reason.\footnote{Sen, personal correspondence with Marion Dalvai. 4 January 2010.}

Sen then refers to an Indian translation theorist, Tejaswini Niranjana, who claims that the postcolonial desire to retranslate is linked to the desire to rewrite history: “Niranjana would read into every translation like mine the appropriation of the text in a way that is subsumed within the post-colonial theory of resistance. But she would also say that that is what translation in the post-colonial context is all about.”\footnote{Sen, personal correspondence with Marion Dalvai. 4 January 2010. See Tejaswini Niranjana, \textit{Siting Translation: History, Post-Structuralism, and the Colonial Context} (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992).}

Srishti Publishers leave the shaping of the paratext in Nivedita Sen’s hands. Her voice clearly comes through in the introduction, the glossary and the “Translator’s Note.” While Sen engages with the puzzling deletions in the 1919 text, both on a paratextual level in the translation and in her correspondence with me, and is slightly uneasy about Rabindranath’s professed textual interventions, Sreejata Guha is more categorical in her answer regarding the ‘authenticity’ of that particular text:

I happen to belong to the school of thought that translation is ‘the most intimate act of reading’ (sic Spivak). Hence an endorsement from the author of the Bangla original to me is just another reading, no more and no less ‘authentic’ than the next reading. [...] I do believe that in the post-structuralist world that I inhabit, following in the footsteps of Fish, Iser, Barthes and others before and since who have imparted agency to the reader and the text s/he creates by the act of reading, ‘fidelity’ to an ‘original’ becomes a reductive and absolutist concept which may have its uses in certain contexts, but in the larger perspective of the praxis of translation, it fails to validate its position. A SL [source language] text is not a static entity; it is shaped and reshaped in every new reading and similarly, each and every translation in a
Both translations, and the Penguin India translation especially, advocate the translation’s closeness and faithfulness to the original. The two voices at the paratextual level in the Penguin India translation, however, do not include the translator’s (who, as we have just seen, does not believe in the categories of ‘authenticity’, ‘completeness’ or ‘faithfulness’). The introduction and notes are by Swagato Ganguly and the reader is also presented with a brief "Publisher's Note": it is here where the claim of proximity to the original is made. There seems to be a divergence between academic discourse on translation, which critically engages with issues of translatability, closeness and faithfulness, on the one hand, and the commercial presentation of translations to the reading public, on the other. In my view, this is not simply a marketing strategy. As I have already demonstrated in several cases, the assumption seems to be that the general readers should not be troubled with the reality of how translated texts are shaped; they are not deemed capable of appreciating an item that is not and cannot be ‘authentic’ or ‘faithful’ to a proclaimed original.

Tagore’s case is by no means as drastic as Carver’s case discussed in chapter 2: although the 2004 and 2005 translations are more complete and therefore slightly longer, they are still recognizably related to the 1919 version. Yet, as the metatextual comments to the different editions have shown, the quest for authenticity in literature is far from over. Whether one considers the author dead or come back to life again, whether one believes in the relative stability of literary texts or strongly asserts their instability, the issue of authenticity must be a central one in the debate on textual interventions.

---

78 Sreejata Guha, personal correspondence with Marion Dalvai. 17 April 2012.
79 For a detailed engagement with the proclaimed death of the author and his/her return, see Sean Burke, Authorship: From Plato to Postmodern. A Reader as well as Burke’s The Death and Return of the Author: Criticism and Subjectivity in Barthes, Foucault and Derrida (Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1998).
Restoring Tagore in the English-speaking West

Tagore was an important (if not the most important) figure to have emerged from the Bengali Renaissance. His works have seen a second renaissance in the English-speaking West in the last thirty years, culminating in several sesquicentenary celebrations of 2010-2012. What agents and factors are responsible for this ongoing restoration of his literary importance?

It seems to me that the restoration of Tagore as a visible member of world literature in its English-language implementation started towards the end of the 1970s. In 1978, Edward Said published the influential Orientalism, from which emerged a multiculturalist interrogation of the traditional Eurocentric canon. In an attempt to redefine the East and itself, the West turned its interest towards forgotten names like Tagore's again. In the early 1980s, a new generation of Indian authors writing in English helped shape a new literary image of the subcontinent and in the process also kindled interest in earlier Indian writers. Two prominent examples are Salman Rushdie and Anita Desai. Rushdie was awarded the Booker Prize for Midnight's Children in 1981. Desai was shortlisted twice during the 1980s, in 1980 for Clear Light of Day and in 1984 for In Custody.

Tagore found a strong academic advocate during the 1970s and 1980s in the late Mary Lago who continued to publish articles and books about the Bengali writer into the twenty-first century. In the late 1980s, Lago demanded "more translations of previously translated works, more translations more faithful to the Bengali originals and free of the awkwardness and crippling deletions that discourage the modern reader" ("Restoring Tagore," 21-22). This call for new translations has not gone unanswered. Amongst recent Tagore translators into English let me mention Pratima Bowes, William Radice, Ketaki Kushari Dyson and Sujit Mukherjee. Thirty translators contributed to The Essential Tagore, an 800-page anthology of Tagore's work, published by Harvard University Press in 2011, the sesquicentenary year of Tagore's birth. Clearly, the decision of Indian 80 Desai was shortlisted a third time in 1999 for Fasting Feasting.

---

universities to teach Indian writers in English translation has played a crucial role in kindling interest in Tagore from academics and translators alike. Western readers have undoubtedly profited from the rapid expansion of English-language publishing in India since 1990.\(^1\)

This restoration process is still ongoing – Tagore’s work is so multifaceted and multi-layered that we can expect more translations of his work and a diversified and challenging critical response in the coming decades, both from Eastern and Western scholars. The interest in Tagore, however, has not been confined to academics, institutions have also played a role in putting Tagore back onto the map. The Tagore Centre UK with its head office in London and a branch in Glasgow has financed and actively encouraged a variety of publications since its foundation in 1985. Marino Rigon, an Italian monk working in Bangladesh since the mid-1950s, has translated many of Tagore’s works into Italian and established the ‘Centro Studi Tagore’ in Venice in the early 1990s. The Indian Cultural Centre in Berlin founded in 1994 is called the Tagore Centre and while it is not specifically dedicated to the Bengali writer, he is clearly seen as a unique symbol of India. While these Tagore Centres all differ in scope and outreach, they want to see themselves as reminders of the importance of Rabindranath.

The latest addition to the growing interest in Tagore has been the foundation of the first Tagore Centre attached to a university, ScoTs (The Scottish Centre of Tagore Studies) at Edinburgh Napier University with the establishment of a chair in Tagore Studies in 2012, held by Professor Indranath Chaudhuri, Academic Director of the Indira Gandhi Institute. The Indian Council for Cultural Relations funds the Chair as well as two PhD fellowships. There are two distinct factors that seem to be behind this upsurge of institutional interest in Tagore here. First, chairs and fellowships in Tagore Studies form part of the strategic agenda of European and US universities trying to establish and strengthen links with institutions in Asia.\(^2\)

---

\(^2\) In April 2011, a delegation from Trinity College Dublin participated in a trade mission to India organized by Enterprise Ireland. “Potential links for key areas of collaboration were explored in the areas of the digital humanities, history, law and business, and political Second, Tagore's iconic status and position as an Indian writer with a complex history of international reception are being used by Indian institutions and government agencies to enhance the profile of Indian culture globally through their funding of research. The coincidence of interest emerges quite clearly from the statements given by Joan Stringer of Edinburgh Napier University and Suresh Goel of the Indian Council for Cultural Relations:

Professor Dame Joan Stringer, Principal & Vice-Chancellor of Edinburgh Napier University, said: “The spirit of Rabindranath Tagore continues to inspire the entire world and it is with great honour that we sign this MoU with the Indian Council for Cultural Relations. It represents a significant step towards the opening of Scotland’s first centre for Tagore Studies at Edinburgh Napier, which we hope will attract research interest from both near and far and, in the spirit of the man himself, will be outward looking, inclusive and visionary.”

Suresh Goel, Director General of the Indian Council for Cultural Relations (ICCR), said: “The ICCR considers this collaboration with the University to be of great importance since it will promote an academic exchange between India and Edinburgh Napier. It has been the philosophy of the ICCR that this kind of cooperation contributes to the civilisation of dialogue and understanding on a much more durable basis.”

Concluding remarks: All is well that ends well? Tagore through English

Over the last three decades, it would seem, Rabindranath Tagore has been reintroduced into the canon of world literature with some vehemence. More English translations by the Bengali writer are in print now than ever before. Although in a traditional bookshop or on the Amazon websites readers are still presented with the first translations rather than the new translations from India, other Internet bookshops stock the new translations and ship them from India in a relatively short time. More Western scholars engage with the writer Tagore and with his œuvre and, subsequently, several of his works are now a mainstay of world literature syllabuses in European and US universities. Still, there are some critical voices that doubt the importance of Tagore and the impact of his literary writing. This becomes apparent in the press coverage of the Tagore celebrations in 2011 in two leading UK newspapers, the Guardian and the Times Literary Supplement.

---

125

In an article written for the Guardian in May 2011, Ian Jack suggests that “perhaps the time has come for us to forget Tagore was ever a poet, and think of his more intelligible achievements.” Jack then summarizes what aspects we should concentrate on: Tagore as an essayist, an educationist, an opponent of terrorism, a secularist, an ecologist, a critical nationalist and a writer who understood women. We should, in short, forget about a large percentage of Tagore’s literary output. The same week, J.C in the Times Literary Supplement wrote:

Who reads Rabindranath Tagore now? Not many, it is safe to say. Yet, a century ago, Tagore, whose 150th anniversary falls this year, was all the rage. [...] If your Bengali is good enough, you might tell us that to read Tagore in the original is to be transported; in English, the tune that was once so new is now apt to sound quaint.

In September 2011, however, Seamus Perry is much kinder in his TLS review of four Tagore texts: William Radice’s new translation of Gitanjali, The Essential Tagore and Radha Chakravarty’s translations of Boyhood Days and of Farewell Song:

---

84 For example, at Amherst College, Rice University, Rutgers and University of Texas in the United States and at Warwick University and the University of Zagreb in Europe.
A welcome flurry of publications, arriving in time for the 150th anniversary of his birth, seeks to remedy the neglect into which Tagore has fallen among those of us who cannot read him in the original. For even allowing for the losses of translation [...] he remains a wonderful writer, humane and unsparing, above all a superb analyst of human longing and its capacity both to transform and to distort the lives it touches. ("Rabindranath Tagore Revived")

In the last days of Tagore’s 150th birthday anniversary, the editorial of the Guardian asks the question why “the scant press coverage accorded to him this past year, has, ironically, focused on why he is so neglected.” The editorial then chastises the Times Literary Supplement author J.C of parochialism for his “Who reads Rabindranath Tagore now” comment but fails to mention the scathing view of the literary translations of Tagore’s works expressed by the Guardian’s own Ian Jack. In the editorial, the work of translators such as Radice and Kushari Dyson is praised. The editorial concludes with the following words: “His 150th anniversary is as good a time as any for readers to rediscover just how various and interesting a man Tagore was.” The new translations of Tagore’s work definitely will play a crucial part in this rediscovery.

The issue whether and how much we need to retranslate, however, has not been resolved, as I have indicated in my discussion of the translations of The Home and the World. Even if we agree that Tagore needs to be retranslated, we should ask how many times over the same work should be translated: do we really ‘need’ three new translations of Chokher Bhali in the space of a few years? While readers worldwide able to read English clearly profit from the increase in English-language translations and publications coming out of India, Ketaki Kushari Dyson expresses uneasiness about the way in which English now dominates translation in India. What seems equally troublesome is the prevalence of English as an academic language. Will Tagore scholars (and Indian scholars in general) decide to simply write in English rather than their native Bengali (or other Indian language) in the future? Kushari Dyson writes of an alarming trend:

If today I write a book on Tagore in Bengali, no matter how path-breaking it may be, it will not be reviewed in an English-language paper, not even in Calcutta, though if I am lucky, I may be interviewed about it. To be reviewed in such a paper the book has to be in English. What can one say about this kind of neo-colonialism?

The danger of this kind of neo-colonialism is indeed a topic that is not willingly broached in Tagore Studies at the moment. While I agree with Peter Hitchcock that the use of English for Academic Purposes can actually dislocate and decolonize English from its rootedness in a specifically Eurocentric location, the imperatives of international academia do not seem to give non-native English speakers much of a choice when it comes to the international visibility or the funding of their research.

While the positive changes in Tagore's literary reputation are certainly to be welcomed, and while the increase in English-language translations and critical writing will win the Bengali writer more readers in the future, the danger of an imbalance in favour of English-language engagement with his works cannot be denied. Will the afterlife of Tagore outside Bengal become a primarily English-language affair?

---

89 Peter Hitchcock, "Decolonizing (the) English," South Atlantic Quarterly 100, no. 3 (2001), 749-71.
Chapter 4: Tahar Ben Jelloun's The Sand Child in English-Language Criticism

Every critical affirmation contains, on the one hand, a recognition of the value of the work which occasions it [...] and on the other hand an affirmation of its own legitimacy. All critics declare not only their judgment of the work but also their claim to the right to talk about it and judge it. In short, they take part in a struggle for the monopoly of legitimate discourse about the work of art, and consequently in the production of the value of the work of art.¹

While I have given a general overview of agents and factors that shaped the reception of Tagore’s The Home and the World in chapter 3, this chapter focuses on a single aspect of the reception process: academic criticism. Tahar Ben Jelloun’s 1985 novel L’enfant de sable, translated into English by Alan Sheridan in 1987 as The Sand Child, will serve as my case study.²

This chapter gives an overview of items of literary criticism about the novel written in English between 1987 and 2011. Leaving aside newspaper reviews and other forms of more ‘popular’ readers’ reactions, the aim is to foreground a specific category of gatekeepers, literary critics who publish academic (generally peer-reviewed) articles and books. The analysis is twofold: in concentrates on specific readings of Ben Jelloun’s novel as well as on the cross-fertilization between individual critical readings and critical discourse across cultures. Academic writing is perhaps the mode of writing most obviously based on generative reading. Using the tools of the text, literary critics construct a rigorous and uncompromising interpretation of the work in question, according to specific rules that are (more or less) well-established in their particular academic field (for example, postcolonial studies or narratology). Peer-reviewed academic articles, book chapters and monographs thus are the result of a ‘working consensus’, which is not an agreement in any absolute sense but a tentative agreement within a specific school of thought.

¹ Pierre Bourdieu, The Field of Cultural Production, 35.

Another factor that plays a crucial role in the cross-cultural exchange of ideas of literary criticism is the habitus of individual and institutional gatekeepers. Habitus is a set of dispositions that generate practices and perceptions of which we are not always consciously aware. It is the result of a long process of inculcation that eventually becomes second nature (see chapter 1). Rather than seeing each interpretation of works of literature as the expression of a subjective viewpoint, my approach is perspectivist: it focuses on individual contributions within several ‘branches’ of literary criticism and also takes into account the combative nature of the academic field, which, pace Bourdieu, is the site of an ongoing classification struggle.

Like the wider academic field, the field of literary criticism is the territory of Bourdieu’s Homo Academicus, “supreme classifier among classifiers” (Homo Academicus, 1). Literary criticism always embodies the specific interests of groups of intellectuals who share a particular vision of and approach to literature.

For over three decades, Tahar Ben Jelloun has been a constant presence on the international book market. Winner of the Prix Goncourt in 1987 and the International IMPAC Dublin Literary Award in 2004, Ben Jelloun has published well over forty works that have been translated into several dozens of languages. Ben Jelloun’s first language is Arabic yet he has published his entire œuvre in French. He also works as a translator.

---

3 I borrow the term from Goffman. See Erving Goffman, The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life (London: Penguin, 1990). The concept is particularly useful in the realm of literary criticism: scholars may agree to disagree on certain interpretations presented to them in academic papers but they will generally accept that, when it comes to focus and methodology, other scholarly interpretations follow the standards set out in their particular area of literary criticism.

4 “The university field is, like any other field, the locus of a struggle to determine the conditions and the criteria of legitimate membership and legitimate hierarchy, that is, to determine which properties are pertinent, effective and liable to function as capital so as to generate the specific profits guaranteed by the field. The different sets of individuals (more or less constituted into groups) who are defined by these different criteria have a vested interest in them. In proffering these criteria, in trying to have them acknowledged, in staking their own claim to constitute them as legitimate properties, as specific capital, they are working to modify the laws of formation of the prices characteristic of the university market, and thereby to increase their potential for profit.” Pierre Bourdieu, Homo Academicus, trans. Peter Collier (Cambridge: Polity Press, 1988), 11.
from Arabic into French. Many of Ben Jelloun’s novels are set in Morocco and he has been praised for bringing the Maghreb closer to French and Western audiences. However, Ben Jelloun has also been attacked (mostly, but not exclusively, by North African scholars and fellow writers) for not writing in his mother tongue and for oversimplifying Maghrebian customs and culture in order to please his audience. For example, in a brief review essay, Hedi Abdel-Jaouad writes: “No one has more consciously and artfully capitalized on cultural syncretism and cosmopolitan idealism than Ben Jelloun," yet admitting that “he is not the only one to have jumped on the cross-cultural bandwagon.” Some voices in the West, contrariwise, tend to idealize Ben Jelloun as an apostle of a new cosmopolitanism, as this extract from a Companion to the World Novel shows:

[Tahar Ben Jelloun] writes fiction to comment on Moroccan society and try and change its archaic structures. Inspired by the French ideals of secularism, equality and social justice, Jelloun militates for a free, egalitarian, and secular society in which religion does not interfere in politics and where men and women have equal rights. His novels focus on Morocco, which he criticizes for its ‘feudal’ institutions based on tyranny, sexual and religious hypocrisy, and women’s oppression.

A fervent social critic, Jelloun is an intellectuel engagé (engaged intellectual) involved in world politics and in issues relating to Morocco, North Africa and the Middle East [...].

An honored novelist and a respected intellectual, Jelloun is a humanist and a man of dialogue, urging understanding and fraternity between people.

---

7 Amar Acheraiou, “Tahar Ben Jelloun,” in The Facts on File. Companion to the World Novel. 1900 to the Present. (New York: Infobase Publishing, 2008), 403-405. Here 404. Stephen William Foster writes in a similar vein: “Ben Jelloun presents a ‘relative self,’ a mobile, molten identity, a double representation, two faces mirroring each other across difference, representing Europe to Morocco and Morocco to Europe. He is not so much cosmopolitan as a representation of cosmopolitanism, certified by the French literary and media establishments, of a cosmopolitanism yet to be achieved in France or elsewhere. He has settled for representing cosmopolitan aspirations that are compromised by Europeans’ ambivalence, their desire for the Other, and their impulse to normalize or even erase otherness, derived from their fears.” Stephen William Foster, Cosmopolitan Desire: Transcultural Dialogues and Antiterrorism in Morocco (Plymouth: AltaMira Press, 2006), 153.
Bernard R. Périsse portrays Ben Jelloun in a similar light in his 2003 comparative thematic study of Nabokov’s American Works and Ben Jelloun’s novels. After stating that Nabokov was against the treatment of social themes in literature, Périsse quotes from Ben Jelloun’s interview with Thomas Spear in which he described his writerly duty: “to be a witness to [...] reality, an engaged witness, personal and sentimental and all that, but a witness nevertheless.” Thus, Périsse posits Ben Jelloun as “an independent thinker and a sincere enthusiast for liberty and justice” who has no hesitation “in criticizing and condemning what he considers as a major impediment to human dignity and to human rights” (Solitude and the Quest for Happiness, 116-17). For Périsse, “it is obvious that as a novelist, he denies himself any temptation to comply rigidly with the Art for Art’s sake principle and give all his attention and energy to form only” (118).

Ben Jelloun’s The Sand Child lends itself to a thorough investigation of the mechanics of academic criticism as it is a highly self-reflexive piece of fiction that is complex enough to cause completely opposing interpretations. It is therefore worthwhile not only to analyze which lines of argument available to the scholarly community working mainly in English are accepted as meaningful, but also to investigate whether the arguments put forward in English acknowledge or adopt arguments present in Ben Jelloun criticism in French. If so, which arguments travel across cultural and linguistic borders into English easily and which arguments do not? Before we can engage with the critical works that deal specifically with The Sand Child, however, an overview of Ben Jelloun’s life and œuvre as well as of the novel’s complex narrative structure are necessary.

---

9 I am aware of the fact that one cannot simply equate a shared language with a shared culture. In the specific case of literary criticism focused on a specific author or novel, however, one can argue that most literary critics who are interested in ‘Francophone’ or ‘Maghrebian’ literature and writing about it in English share enough of a common background, a habitus, to engage in a meaningful exchange about the significance of a particular book/author and the existing criticism on these. I also assume that, within a particular school of thought, critics labour towards establishing a working consensus on issues that are important to them.
Tahar Ben Jelloun, ‘un écrivain marocain de langue française’

Ben Jelloun was born into a poor family in Fez, Morocco in 1944, when the country was still a protectorate of both Spain and France. Ben Jelloun went to a Koranic primary school in Fez until his family moved to Tangiers, a city “naturally projected towards Europe, yet deeply rooted in Africa.”¹⁰ Here, Ben Jelloun attended French secondary school before moving on to the University of Rabat to study philosophy. In 1966, because of his involvement in a student protest against King Hassan II, Ben Jelloun was sent to two different internment camps for eighteen months, an experience he drew on in The Blinding Absence of Light for which he won the IMPAC prize in 2004. After his release, Ben Jelloun worked as a philosophy teacher while also contributing to Anfas/Souffles, a cultural magazine in Tangiers founded by Abdellatif Laâbi in 1966. When the Moroccan government decided that philosophy was to be exclusively taught through Arabic, Ben Jelloun left for Paris to read for a doctorate in social psychiatry. He started writing poetry and novels, as well as articles for Le Monde. His first essay La plus haute des solitudes (1977) investigates the Moroccan immigrant community in France and their misery. It draws on his doctoral dissertation, which researched sexual impotence among North African migrants at the Dejerine Centre for Psychosomatic Medicine. Ben Jelloun’s first bestseller, the novel Harrouda (1973), had already won him critical acclaim from Samuel Beckett and Roland Barthes.

Ben Jelloun sees himself as a public figure and his writing tends to be interpreted as politically engaged. Two titles stand out in particular in this regard: French Hospitality (1984) and Racism explained to my daughter (1998).¹¹ The first work has been widely criticized, although it was republished in 1997 (English translation 1999) with a new introduction in which Ben Jelloun responds to some of the original criticism and reiterates key points about the difference between the concept and practice of hospitality in France and Morocco. Racism explained to my daughter, on the other hand, became an instant bestseller and has been translated into over thirty languages.\(^\text{12}\)

---

¹¹ On the public figure of the writer, see Ben Jelloun’s semi-autobiographical L’écrivain publique (Paris: Seuil, 1983).

In the Maghrebian context, Ben Jelloun’s decision to write in French rather than Arabic is by no means an exception. He is part of a growing number of North African writers who choose to write in French and he does not want to be described as a Francophone, but a French writer.\(^\text{13}\) Ben Jelloun has described the French language as liberating, and the association of Arabic with the Koran as a barrier to experimentation.\(^\text{14}\) His novels, however, constantly bring him back to a Moroccan setting, which is also the case with The Sand Child. The novel’s sequel, La Nuit Sacrée (1987), translated by Sheridan as The Sacred Night in 1989, won the coveted Prix Goncourt.\(^\text{15}\) In the last twenty years, Ben Jelloun has published \(^\text{13}\) “While he sees himself as a ‘Moroccan writer of French expression,’ and says a writer’s identity is defined by ‘language not nationality,’ as a French national he objects to being described as a francophone, rather than a French, writer.” Maya Jaggi, “Voice of the Maghreb,” The Guardian, 6 May 2006. Available online at: http://www.guardian.co.uk/books/2006/may/06/featuresreviews.guardianreview27. Last accessed on 14 September 2012. Tellingly, Ben Jelloun is one of forty-four writers to have signed a 2007 manifesto in Le Monde that advocated moving away from the term ‘Francophone literature’ in favour of ‘world literature in French.’ The English translation of the manifesto was published two years later. Ben Jelloun and his fellow intellectuals argue that “the emergence of a consciously affirmed, transnational world-literature in the French language, open to the world, signs the death certificate of so-called francophone literature. No one speaks or writes ‘francophone.’ Francophone literature is a light from a dying star. How could the world be concerned with the language of a virtual country?” Daniel Simon (trans.), “Towards a ‘World-Literature’ in French,” World Literature Today 83, issue 2 (March/Apr 2009): 54-56. Here 56.

\(^\text{14}\) “I often say that the fact of writing in French is a way for us to be somewhat bold and also to be relevant, because when one writes in Arabic, one is slightly intimidated by the language of the Koran.” Thomas Spear and Caren Litherland, “Politics and Literature: An Interview with Tahar Ben Jelloun,” Yale French Studies 82, no. 2 (1993): 30-43. Here 34.

\(^\text{15}\) According to William Cloonan, Ben Jelloun fit the pattern “for a goncourable author. He was in the preferred age category, about forty-one years old, had written articles for Le Monde, and had previously published six books with Seuil. He was already a literary figure of some prominence whose taste in fiction corresponded, at least in some areas, with traditional Goncourt thinking. […] The confluence of a noteworthy novel, a climate of opinion, and an established author allowed the jurors to make an award that permitted them to champion progress without making any significant changes in the essential Goncourt philosophy.” William Cloonan, “The Politics of Prizes: The Goncourt in the 1980s” in Regards sur la France des Années 1980, ed. Joseph Brami, Madeleine Cottemet-Hage and Pierre Verdaguer (Saratoga, Calif.: ANMA Libri, 1994), 215-222. Here 220.
dozens of works and has won a myriad of literary and non-literary prizes, including the IMPAC prize in 2004 and the Erich-Maria-Remarque peace prize in 2011.

In Ben Jelloun’s fictions, readers are confronted with references to sociology, psychology, politics and the everyday life of outsiders (prostitutes, androgynes, madmen) as well as a strong reliance on mythology and the supernatural. In terms of narrative techniques, Ben Jelloun excels at constantly blurring literary genres and at playfully engaging with and distorting traditionally accepted narrative devices. This mix of realism and myth and the unwillingness to adopt a single specific narrative strategy may confuse many readers but Ben Jelloun has a growing readership worldwide: many of his novels have become part of the curriculum at secondary school level and at university level. His novels can, for example, be found on the French curriculum of the German ‘Abitur,’ as well as on several world literature courses (including at Northwestern and Columbia universities in the United States). The complexity of Ben Jelloun’s polyphonous writing clearly also makes a perfect playground for literary criticism.

The Sand Child

The protagonist of the novel is a child who is born into a family already ‘cursed’ with seven girls. Thus, the eighth child, although biologically a girl, is presented to the world as a boy by the name of Ahmed. Seven different narrators tell often conflicting versions of how Ahmed realizes that he is different and his painful journey towards a new identity, Zahra. In the sequel, The Sacred Night, Zahra rises to speak herself.

The basic narrative structure of The Sand Child shows a constant tension between two ways of storytelling: the spoken and the written word. Not only do we have a variety of storytellers who give us different versions of the protagonist’s life; there is an underlying question: what makes a good, authentic story? While some narrators derive the right to speak from their possession of the protagonist’s diary (here, authenticity is conferred to the written word), others derive the right to speak from personal experience (this applies especially to the only female storyteller, Fatuma). Some narrators, however, argue that authenticity (conventionally understood as correspondence to what really happened) has nothing to do with a good story.

There are seven narrators telling the story of the sand child. Three of them claim to have access to the protagonist's diary.

!Figure 1: Narrators in The Sand Child

There is no consensus amongst Ben Jelloun scholars on the exact number of narrators or the names of the first and the second narrator. Marrouchi, for example, wrongly states that there are six storytellers: the teller devoured by his own sentences, the man with female breasts, the woman with the poorly shaved beard, Salem, Amar and Fatuma. There is a chapter in the novel entitled "The Woman with the Badly Shaven Beard" but there is no indication that the narrator of this story is indeed a woman. The confusion as to the names of narrator 1 and narrator 2 is even greater. There is a reference to a certain Si Abdel Malek in the text (Salem is told that he does not have "the gifts of Si Abdel Malek, may God have his soul..." when he wants to tell his version of the story; Ben Jelloun, Sand Child, 105) but critics are unclear about whether Si Abdel Malek is the name of narrator 1 or narrator 2. Laila Ibnlfassi calls the first narrator Si Abdel Malek; Memmes claims that Si Abdel Malek is the name of Fatima’s brother and suggests that the first narrator is called Bouchaïb. Memmes further believes that narrator 1 actually corresponds to narrator 7; in which case he faked his own death (“Démarche interculturelle,” 72n17). Shona Elizabeth Simpson states that the last storyteller is in fact a fictionalized Ben Jelloun himself and that “as he speaks, we realize that he was also the first, the man who ‘dared to recount the story and destiny of the eighth birth.’” Similarly, Ibnlfassi argues that, by “putting himself more into his work,” Ben Jelloun “leaves no doubt as to the identity of the speaker when he writes: ‘Ma vie fut principalement consacrée aux livres. J’en ai écrit, publié, détruit, lu, aimé… toute ma vie avec des livres.’ [ES, p.187]” (“Ambiguity of Self-Structure,” 169).

---

The above diagram hints at the complexity of the narrative but it cannot make apparent the various narrative layers. Not only do readers have to negotiate different unreliable storytellers and contradicting versions of Ahmed/Zahra’s life; each narrator inserts comments on the nature of storytelling into their tales so readers have to deal with metanarrative comments as well as a chaotic plot and changing narrative voices. I have myself tried to summarize the nineteen chapters of the novel according to structure, plot development and metatextual commentary, a difficult and frustrating task that is, however, necessary (see appendix I). There are so many layers in this narrative which sometimes overlap but more often contradict one another, and which cast doubt on every single enunciation uttered by any of the seven narrators. It also seems virtually impossible to detect a clear authorial voice or intent behind the myriad of voices surging from the text. How, then, do literary critics, set in their habitual approaches to literature, deal with the complexity of The Sand Child?

Ben Jelloun uses narrative devices that could easily pertain to the Western tradition of novel writing, especially the nouveau roman, as well as to Arab letters and to Moroccan oral tradition (the storyteller and the halqa, the circle of listeners surrounding the storyteller on the public square). As we have seen, the combination of these narrative traditions results in polyphony, intertextuality, and an outright refusal of narrative closure. The indeterminacy of the text allows for a variety of interpretations from all angles of literary criticism (inter alia, gender studies, postcolonial studies and psychoanalytical criticism). The different interpretations ask and very often struggle to answer some of the following questions: Can one read Ben Jelloun’s novel as a document regarding actual Morocco? Is he criticizing colonialism and patriarchy or is he more interested in narrative structures? Is Ben Jelloun primarily a postmodern writer? Is he primarily a postcolonial writer? What weighs more heavily, the narrative (plot) or the metanarrative (metafictional elements)? What sources does Ben Jelloun use (Western and/or Arab)? Are the novel’s unreliable narrators signs of the ‘foreignness’ of Maghrebian culture or rather a tribute to writers such as Queneau, Borges and Calvino? Is Ben Jelloun indebted to Berber orality or is this a postmodern novel that wants to break with both Western and Maghrebian tradition?

In the twenty-five years following the publication of L’enfant de sable, several MA and PhD theses but very few monographs have been dedicated to this complex novel, or indeed, Ben Jelloun. This is especially true for criticism available in English.¹⁹ There are, however, about forty articles and book chapters written in English on the novel. Most of these concentrate exclusively on The Sand Child, but some pair the book up with other novels by Ben Jelloun, mainly its sequel The Sacred Night or with novels written by French, African or Asian writers.

---

¹⁹ Predictably, the situation is different where French-language criticism is concerned. See appendix II for a preliminary list of academic articles, book chapters and books written in French on or relevant to The Sand Child (the list does not include MA or PhD theses).
In my survey, the aim is not to give detailed summaries of all the items of criticism dealing with The Sand Child but to take a closer look at the mechanisms of cross-fertilization of certain strands of interpretation within English-language criticism and between English- and French-language criticism, and to account for the presence or lack of such cross-fertilization. In this context, the first few articles to introduce a specific thought within a quite narrowly defined field of interest will be given particular attention. This ‘zooming in’ on specific articles and the modus operandi of their authors will show how working consensus is achieved in the specific practice of academic peer-reviewed publishing. As all academic criticism is an act of persuasion, I also include (sometimes quite substantial) quotations from the articles to give readers a feel of the argumentative style and language adopted by the different critics.

Document, commentary or aesthetic object?

The interpretations of The Sand Child depend on 1) the critic’s repertoire and on the critical angle adopted (such as gender studies, sociology of literature, postcolonial studies, semiotics) and 2) more general assumptions about literature that shape the critic’s habitus and strategies of rhetorical hermeneutics, as outlined in chapters 1 and 2. The large majority of criticism of The Sand Child in English relates the novel to either postcolonial or gender studies, or both. A smaller, second strand of Ben Jelloun criticism shifts the focus from the level of the plot and its possible criticism of reality to the convoluted narrative structure of the novel, trying to make sense of the text’s intricate polyphony.

Broadly speaking, we can distinguish three approaches to The Sand Child: there is a small group of critics who interpret the novel as a socio-political critique of Moroccan society, especially its treatment of women, and therefore share the view that literature has a documentary function. The novel is not just an individual’s commentary on social reality but can be used as a document which, alongside historical and sociological documents, tells us something about the ‘real’ Morocco. At the opposite end of the spectrum we find a small group of critics who see the novel as an aesthetic exercise.
The working consensus amongst critics who interpret the novel along the lines of the nouveau roman and Postmodernist writing techniques is that literature is fundamentally an autonomous field of artistic production that has no significant correspondence to reality. Most critics who have written on the novel seem to position themselves somewhere between these two extreme poles, claiming that the novel is a commentary on Moroccan society (not to be confused with a document, as I have explained in chapter 1).

Both extreme tendencies are present in Ben Jelloun criticism and at several times they seem to exclude one another. When Tamara El-Hoss argues that The Sand Child is mainly concerned with the plight of Moroccan women, she treats the novel as a linear narrative coherently told by an authorial narrator. The documentary modes of literary criticism at times seem to struggle to make a convincing argument if they mention in too much detail the multiple contradicting narrative voices. At the same time, one cannot simply argue the opposite either: the array of metafictional and magical elements do not preclude that the work might actually criticize aspects of Moroccan life. One thing is certain: the text of The Sand Child offers such a wide variety of hooks onto which to latch an interpretation that the resulting apparatus of literary criticism resembles the original text in its complexities and contradictions.

In very general terms, critics approaching the novel from a postcolonial critical angle are interested in the representation of the effects that French colonialism has had on Morocco. According to postcolonial theory (represented by the writings of, inter alia, Frantz Fanon, Edward Said and Homi Bhabha), formerly colonized societies that have undergone foreign political rule have experienced a forced modernization of certain areas of public life while the bond with the indigenous culture and tradition has been severed. In the case of The Sand Child, the parallels between the power relations between France and Morocco and between men and women in the novel constitute one major focus of analysis from the postcolonial angle. Several critics position Ben Jelloun in a transnational space of (world) literature, either alongside other subaltern writers writing in French or alongside other writers 'from the margins' who, in a famous phrase coined in the field of postcolonial studies, write back to the centre.

---

Gender studies critics have a field day with the novel as it (quite obviously) lends itself to an analysis of biological and acquired gender, female and male identity and sexuality, as well as androgyne. Major sources are Hélène Cixous and Judith Butler, but also North African intellectuals, such as writer Assia Djebar and sociologist Fatima Mernissi.

Within these two broad categories, one can distinguish a tendency to focus on one or several of the following issues:

1) Gender roles: criticism that sees Ben Jelloun as portraying the misery of women's lives in Muslim society and as attacking misogyny within Moroccan society specifically and Islamic society generally.

2) Structuring values in Moroccan society: criticism that links gender issues, especially the discrepancy between biological and social gender, to larger political issues such as the colonization and decolonization of Morocco: just as the West has historically defined the non-West as object, women continue to be posited as objects/non-subjects in postcolonial Morocco.

3) Corporeality (of protagonist and text): criticism that argues for a strong connection between the body of the text and the body of the protagonist. Sexuality plays a major role in this context: there is a hidden power in Ahmed's discovery of sexuality, just as there is a hidden power in the fluidity of the narrative.

4) Language and identity: criticism that argues for a strong connection between language and identity. Basing itself mainly on poststructuralist theories of language, this approach no longer sees language as a neutral means of communication. Rather, language has social value: it is biased according to gender, race, class and ethnicity. In the case of a protagonist who is both a man (socially) and a woman (biologically) and who is presented as speaking (of) him/herself, one can analyze the interdependence of language, discourse and identity.

---

Other critics state that the plot of The Sand Child is of secondary importance and that one should focus on the narrative techniques employed by Ben Jelloun, instead: this is a work of metafiction which constantly draws attention to its own artificial nature and exposes different techniques of tale-telling. There is a playfulness in metafiction that seems to be at odds with the seriousness of the questions of gender and power analyzed by critics mainly interested in the novel’s plot, as well as an impressive degree of self-reflexivity that, again, seems to contradict the socio-political criticism detected by some critics. Critical engagement with the narrative techniques reminiscent of postmodernism used in The Sand Child focus on one or more of the following aspects:

1) Metafiction: criticism that sees the text as metacommentary on the structuring of narratives. Critics focus on the different diegetic levels of the narrative as well as on the metafictional commentary provided by the seven narrators. The use of metafictional elements is seen either as in line with mainstream French and European postmodern forms of writing or as specifically Maghrebian.

2) Intertextuality: criticism concentrating on the novel’s links to other texts, mainly to Borges and The 1001 Nights. The text’s evident intertextuality is sometimes linked to the ‘intersexuality’ of the protagonist: just as the protagonist is in-between sexes, the text consciously takes up an in-between position, on the threshold to European literature, in a transnational space that escapes narrow definition.

---

3) Techniques of magical realism: criticism interested in a transnational network of ‘marginal’ writers, such as Rushdie and Borges, who subvert the categories of writing established by the Western centre by merging realism with fantastical narrative elements.

Before we move on to the arguments made by English-language critics, I must draw attention to the venues of this criticism: most peer-reviewed articles in English dealing with Ben Jelloun’s novel have been written by academics associated with North American universities and published in North American journals. Most book chapters dealing with Ben Jelloun’s novel have also been published by North American publishers. The journal with the highest number of Sand Child articles is the French Review, published by the American Association of Teachers of French (three articles in English, four in French), followed by Research in African Literatures, published by Indiana University Press (three articles in English). Other North American journals have published only one contribution on the novel to date, for example: World Literature Today (University of Oklahoma), boundary 2 (Duke University Press), Yale French Studies (Yale University Press), Dalhousie French Studies (Dalhousie University Press), Comparative Literature (University of Oregon) and differences: A Journal of Feminist Cultural Studies (Duke University Press). It was only in 2000 that a journal based in Europe, Neophilologus, published the first article on The Sand Child. It is perhaps not surprising that most contributions in English should be published in North America; what is striking, though, is the consensus on the literary approach to be adopted towards the novel.

Since the early 1990s, the critical engagement with literature considered ‘marginal’ has featured high on the agenda in Western academic circles. While this has helped rethink the definition of literature, it might also have helped to commodify ‘subaltern’ culture and ultimately resulted in the Western education system assimilating so-called marginal culture for its own interest. Graham Huggan warned against this commodification over a decade ago:

It seems worth questioning the neo-imperialist implications of a postcolonial literary/critical industry centred on, and largely catering to, the West. English is, almost exclusively, the language of this critical industry, reinforcing the view that postcolonialism is a discourse of translation, rerouting cultural products regarded as emanating from the periphery toward audiences who see themselves as coming from the centre.

Introducing Ben Jelloun: Mortimer, Thacher, Abdalaoui and Marrouchi

Ben Jelloun’s The Sand Child was first mentioned in a brief review article in World Literature Today in 1986. The author of the review, Mildred Mortimer, is one of the first American scholars to have engaged with Maghrebian literature from the late 1970s onwards. In 1986, none of Ben Jelloun’s other writings had yet been translated into English, and the translation of L’enfant de sable was still in the making. According to Mortimer, Ben Jelloun’s novel is “both an episodic Oriental tale told by a traditional storyteller and a disquieting journal of a solitary soul in distress.” Mortimer interprets the ambiguity of Ahmed/Zahra’s sexual identity as a representation of the consequences of a loss of identity, “whether linguistic, cultural or political. In this highly poetic, imaginative novel, the writer reminds us that to assume the mask of ‘the other’ is to face pain, isolation, and finally self-destruction” (Mortimer 1986, 509).

When Alan Sheridan’s translation for the New York publisher Harcourt Brace Jovanovich appeared in 1987, Ben Jelloun was still known to relatively few English-speaking academics. He was in fact erroneously 24 Gayatri Spivak Chakravorty has voiced this concern several times, for example in “Theory in the Margin: Coetzee’s Foe Reading Defoe’s Crusoe/Roxana,” in Consequences of Theory, ed. Jonathan Arac and Barbara Johnson (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1991), 154-80.

described as an Algerian writer in an overview of French literary events in 1987 which could not fail to mention who had won the Prix Goncourt.27

Alan Sheridan's translation is reviewed the following year by Jean-Louise Thacher alongside eight other examples of so-called 'Arabic fiction.'28 Thacher can accord each novel relatively little space, yet she manages to succinctly describe what she finds most intriguing in The Sand Child:

Tahar Ben Jelloun's The Sand Child [...] is based firmly on culture/tradition, but the plot is influenced by and developed with the aid of literary legacy, legend, and the vivid imagination of the author. [...] This novel is perhaps the most complex of those under review here, because of the many levels on which the story is told and because of its conspicuous oral and traditional heritage. [...] The novel is sensitive and perceptive when one of the listeners describes Ahmed Mohammed's struggle with the feminine side of 'his' nature. The work is also violent, fantastic, convoluted in style, rich in images, and filled with metaphors and the metaphysical. It is to be hoped that its sequel, The Sacred Night, will soon be available in English and that is will contain the answers to some of the questions aroused by this strange masterpiece. ("Arabic Fiction," 482-83)

Due to their brevity, these two introductory review essays only manage to draw attention to and provide quite generalized comments about the writer and the novel. Full-length critical essays started to appear at the beginning of the 1990s: two of the first contributions were by Maghrebian critics who most probably had been familiar with Ben Jelloun's work for over a decade.

Very little material is available in English about Ben Jelloun's position amongst French-language writers from Morocco or the larger Maghreb. The notable exception seems to be M'hamed Alaoui Abdalaoui's 1992 overview "The Moroccan Novel in French" which positions Ben Jelloun in a specific historical context, that of Moroccan writers of an earlier generation, such as Ahmed Sefrioui, Driss Chraïbi, Kateb Yacine and Abdellatif Laâbi.29 It also provides readers with an overview of Ben Jelloun’s early œuvre. Of L’Enfant de Sable and La Nuit Sacrée, Abdalaoui says:

These two novels make their way among myths, legends and reality, between the masculine and the feminine, between being and its double; it is an itinerary on the outer edges of ourselves, where what we assume to be certain is only an illusion, or just one image in a mirror. Both novels can be read as offering a view of Muslim society, a defense of the woman who is not only ‘walled in’ but forbidden to exist (which did not fail to captivate the imagination of Western readers and critics – with whose tastes, moreover, the author is not unfamiliar). (“Moroccan Novel,” 26)

In half a paragraph, Abdalaoui manages to capture the complexity of the plot as well as to imply criticism of the author’s familiarity with Western literary tastes and his presumed exploitation thereof. Abdalaoui then proceeds to locate Ben Jelloun’s narrative techniques within a specifically Moroccan tradition:

When Khaïr-Eddine announced his intention, in the first issue of Souffles (1966), ‘d’écrire un roman complexe où poésie et délire seraient un’ (7) [to write a complex novel in which poetry and delirium would be one], he unwittingly pointed toward what would become a standard procedure not only in his work but also in the work of other novelists from his generation—novelists such as Ben Jelloun and Laâbi as well as Algerians such as Rachid Boudjedra. Because the itinerary of delirium is in total contradiction with an organized universe, it authorizes a number of transgressions – authorial, social, religious, and sexual. (15)

The critic’s recommendation is clear: Ben Jelloun’s style should be seen not as an emulation of Western postmodernist techniques but in line with Maghrebian tradition and, more specifically, with a poetics of delirium developed by Moroccan writers.
The first academic article in English dedicated exclusively to Ben Jelloun’s novel is a detailed investigation of the author’s narrative techniques: Patricia Geesey’s translation of an article by Mustapha Marrouchi, published two years before Abdalaoui’s contribution, in 1990.

Drawing heavily on examples from the twin novels L’enfant de sable and La nuit sacrée, the article provides many English-speaking readers who have little or no knowledge of certain aspects of Moroccan life with an explanation of, for example, the importance of orality and the halqa (round table of listeners). The twin novels are not about the plot, Marrouchi claims, as the theme can be summarized in a single sentence: ‘My aunt is a man.’ Rather, the two novels are reflections about the blurring boundaries of narration, and an exercise of metafiction. Ever since Moha le fou, Moha le sage (1980), Ben Jelloun has drawn attention to the self-representational nature of narrative, borrowing from a variety of sources:

If Ben Jelloun draws inspiration from the collective imaginary of a Maghrebian culture in which one finds a hodge-podge of elements borrowed from the Koran, the worship of Saints, Muslim mystics [...] and popular traditions [...] , certain obsessive images plunge us into his personal mythology and his own hallucinations. (Marrouchi, “Breaking up/down/out,” 74-5)

Marrouchmi defends Ben Jelloun’s style, describing his language as “clear and simple”; and although Ben Jelloun very often writes fragmented sentences, “he obviously refuses to elaborate his writings for the sake of writing. In short, it is as if Ben Jelloun has been unaffected by the fashions of French literature. Gratuitous literary games are the antithesis of his work as writer” (77). In Marrouchmi’s view, then, critics should focus on the self-representational narrative act and metafiction. Marrouchmi does not concern himself with the politics of the body, gender matters or decolonization, topics that will seem paramount to many critics writing subsequently about The Sand Child.

---

30 Patricia Geesey is a scholar and translator who has also translated other critical essays on Moroccan literature, such as Zohra Mezgueldi, “Mother-Word and French-Language Moroccan Writing,” Research in African Literatures 27, no. 3 (1996), 1-14.
Both Abdalaoui and Marrouchi stress the centrality of narrative techniques in Ben Jelloun's writing.\textsuperscript{31} Other articles written on the novel in English around the same time, however, focus on the plot more than on narrative techniques in an attempt to analyse the representation of gender.

Questions of gender in The Sand Child: Cavenaze and Corredor

The first article in English that looks at gender matters in The Sand Child is Odile Cazenave's 1991 "Gender, Age, and Narrative Transformations in L'enfant de sable by Tahar Ben Jelloun," published in the French Review.\textsuperscript{32}

The article actually does broach the matter of gender and misogyny, but in its use of Althusser's Ideological State Apparatuses (ISAs) it is more interested in the construction of identity on an abstract level. Cazenave starts out by claiming that "in North-African Literature, factors of age and gender appear to be key elements in determining the role and status in society for a given character," thus positioning herself along the theoretical lines of gender studies ("Gender, Age, and Narrative Transformations," 437).

As the article progresses, however, Cazenave indiscriminately uses phrases such as "the character's true identity" and "not only does the character deny her gender but also her ethnic background and national heritage" (440-41). She seems to imply that gender and ethnic/national \textsuperscript{31} Marrouchi returns to Ben Jelloun in "My Aunt is a Man: Ce "je"-là est multiple," Comparative Literature 54, no. 4 (2002): 325-256. The Francophone Maghrebian author faces problems of definition, Marrouchi states at the beginning of his essay: "He or she is described and redescribed, sloganized and falsified, until, for the howling combatants, he or she almost ceases to exist. He or she becomes a sort of a myth, an empty vessel into which the world can pour its prejudices, its poison, and its hate" (326). In 2002, Marrouchi reiterates what he had said in his 1990 article, yet also integrating some of the critical readings of Ben Jelloun from the 1990s: "Ben Jelloun is not immediately easy to read: he does not really provide plots to follow or characters with whom to identify. His terrain is that of the dispossessed; his characters remain exiled from family, gender, tribe, or nation. His reputation outside the Francophone world is largely based on two intertwined narratives of the fantastic, which have earned him inevitable comparisons with Marquéz, Borges, and Rushdie. The distinctive feature of his work is, however, a consuming obsession with language. Dense with allusion, metaphor, and echoes of his native Arabic, his texts are deeply inscribed with his migrant sensibility. His work takes, therefore, a little training, and some time spent on counterpoint (or variational) writing helps us to read this foreign, strange and "difficult" writer, who is also one of the few authentic voices to have risen to meet the challenge of 'leaving home' " (327). Marrouchi then performs such a contrapuntal reading of Ben Jelloun but he does not refer to The Sand Child specifically.

affiliation are stable entities rather than constructed and fluid (as generally accepted within the field of gender studies). Cazenave’s argument appears to me to be weakened by her unreflected use of gender studies vocabulary: “Once aware of the artificiality of her status as he-subject, she conquers her true subjectivity as an individual in deciding that, precisely, she will be that he-subject that has been forced upon her” (442). There is no attempt to define ‘subjectivity’ in this case, let alone ‘true’ subjectivity. Other statements seem equally troublesome: Ahmed and Fatima are “both sick, one due to natural biological causes, the other due to his/her own choice […] In its very essence, Ahmed’s infirmity is more severe than the cousin’s’” (440).

Cazenave’s engagement with the multiplicity of narrative voices is also informed by her main concern, the construction of identity:

Just as the image of woman is broken down into a myriad of facets in cubist art, so Ben Jelloun reflects Ahmed’s image through the assemblage of the multiple strategies of the narrative […] Through this device, the author rounds out his character while demonstrating at the same time that he cannot be seized in his totality.” (445)

As a critic concerned with the ‘true identity’ of the novel’s protagonist, Cazenave’s other concern is with the authenticity of the narrative, where authenticity is linked to the ownership of the story. She sees a parallel between the impossibility of establishing an authentic narrative voice and Ahmed/Zarah’s impossible quest for his/her ‘true’ identity. Towards the end of her contribution, Cazenave also establishes a similar link to the “problem” of Maghrebian literature in French: “Until very recently, Maghrebin [sic] authors writing in French were traumatized since, on the one hand, they denied their true identity and, on the other, this effort gained them only marginal acceptance and attention in French literature” (450, emphasis added). In Cazenave’s analysis, the narrative complexities seem to be subordinated to the plot or rather, they are meant to accentuate the ‘message’ of the novel: this is a novel about a disturbed individual struggling to find his/her identity, living in a society or culture struggling to find its identity after decolonization.

As a first contribution to Ben Jelloun criticism from the critical angle of gender studies, this article makes some valid points that will be taken up and developed by other critics. Yet, the recurring use of expressions such as ‘true identity’ sets it at odds with the tenets of gender studies, namely that identity is a construct and not an innate state of being. While using certain ‘buzzwords’ of gender studies in order to position herself within that particular field, Cazenave does not refer directly to gender studies theory: in fact, all she uses are two chapters from a collection of essays entitled Feminist Criticism and Social Change. Sex, Class and Race in Literature and Culture, and the ‘Works Cited’ includes no more than eight titles.

The following year, the French Review published an article by Eva L. Corredor on father figures in Maghrebian fiction. Besides Ben Jelloun’s twin novels, Corredor also analyses Rachid Boudjedra’s Pour ne plus rêver (1965) and Mourad Bourboune’s Le Muezzin (1968) in light of the representation of the autocratic position of the father and its effects on the protagonists. She sees The Sand Child as a critique of Muslim society which values a male heir to such an extent that it forces the father to play God: “Instead of Allah, the father will be the ‘god’ who determines not only his own place in society, and thus his worldly destiny, but also the sex of his eighth child, who, again, is a girl” (Corredor, “(Dis)Embodiments,” 300). Ahmed/Zahra’s body is “an embodiment of schizophrenia, a body sacrificed to the ego of the father and the folly of society” (301). Corredor conceals the fact that there are several narrators telling the protagonist’s story in order to be able to ground her findings about father-child relations in both psychoanalytical and sociological terms.

34 Similarly, as I pointed out above, Tamara El-Hoss’s contribution to an edited volume dedicated to disguise, deception and trompe-l’œil also fails to mention the narrative complexities. Tamara El-Hoss wants to “investigate the manner in which, through various stages of deception and disguise, and with his father’s ‘blessing’, Ben Jelloun’s protagonist succeeds in building his masculine identity (Ahmed), only to discard it after his father’s death, thus allowing his female persona (Zahra) to emerge” (149). Using Mernissi, El-Hoss gives a brief overview of the role of women in Arab Muslim society before describing how Ahmed’s existence is regulated by a double veil: “the first is a symbolic veil he wears (in public as well as in private) to mask his biological gender, while the second is the physical veil (the hijab in Arabic) he does not wear as long as his father is alive, be it in private or in public, since Ben Jelloun’s protagonist is perceived to be a man” (151). El-Hoss follows up this textual example with quotes from the Koran, Asmas Barlas, professor at Ithaca College, and Nawad El Saadawi, an Egyptian feminist and activist. Then she analyzes the importance of the hammam (failing to acknowledge Jurney Ramond’s 2004 contribution about the hammam in The Sand Child written in French; see Appendix II) and the importance of the character of Fatima for Ahmed’s reflection on gender issues (not quoting
The fictional process of self-discovery here leads to a multitude of possible solutions that are all more or less ‘surreal,’ as are Ahmed’s being and authenticity within his society. [...] Once the protagonist becomes fully aware of his/her existential predicament, he seems to run away from home – or, at least we think so; it may all just be in his imagination, a surrealist journey within his prison, without his ever leaving the glass cage. In the course of these fantastic journeys, Ahmed leads the life of a transvestite, a circus attraction as a man with a woman’s breasts. His imagined possible destinies are multiple and we could add our own. (301)

The “fantastic journeys” in question are not the protagonist’s hallucinations but versions delivered by different storytellers. At the time of writing this article, Corredor must have had access to Marrouchi’s 1990 article on narrative techniques and metafictional elements in Ben Jelloun in English, as well as to several contributions in French written about the novel between 1986 and 1991, some of which also engage with the complexity of the narrative aspects. None of these are mentioned; in fact, only three books are cited in the bibliography besides the four novels discussed in the article: a book and an article by Michel Foucault and a book by Charles Bonn on Algerian literature. Is it conceivable that Corredor simply misread the presence of the different narrators as ‘personifications’ of the protagonist’s hallucinations? It strikes me that narrative complexities have been suppressed because they did not serve the argument.

While Cazenave and Corredor see Ben Jelloun’s novel as expressing a particularly African or Maghrebian consciousness that aims to write back to France and Europe, other critics see his writing more in line with Western literary models.

any of the previous criticism on this topic, either in English or in French). El-Hoss does quote Erickson (1998) and Hayes. Ultimately, the critic seems to suggest that the novel is a mirror image of Muslim society: “By disguising her biological gender in The Sand Child and deceiving everyone around her, Zahra has transgressed numerous boundaries within a Muslim society and has cause a fitna. As a consequence, she has upset the order established by Allah. Her punishment for such a transgression is to live her life as someone unable to experience sexual pleasure (sexual pleasure is unattainable after a clitorodectomy), an asexual being in-between genders (she is, after all, a bearded woman), banned from the universe of women (since she is not a ‘real’ woman) as well as from the universe of men (since she is socially no longer a man), a fact/reality she accepts without tears” (159).
Confessional voices: Meyer

The starting point for Meyer's 1992 analysis of two 'Arab' novels, Season of Migration to the North by Tayeb Salih and The Sand Child, is the argument that postcolonial literature tends to "mimic the minority strain of subjectivity and ambivalence that characterizes much of late colonial literature."35 Both novels, Meyer argues, are confessional as they "combine the aims of expressing both subjectivity and ambivalence" and are shaped as personal histories in which "the search for personal and social identity is the overriding theme" ("Confessional Voice," 140). Thus, the subjectivity of the confessional voice reflects the search for identity, both national and cultural. The ambivalence stands for the crisis in the social, political and cultural spheres of life. While Salih's novel is a "crisis" narrative (the protagonist moves from abstract idealism towards romantic disillusionment), The Sand Child is a "developmental" confessional narrative (the protagonist moves from an initial state of disillusionment towards a new-found sense of values). Comparing the subordinated position of women in decolonized countries to the subordinated position of the country during colonization, Meyer describes Ahmed/Zahra's story as a national parable: the "ambiguity of gender imposed on the main character in childhood can be taken to represent the colonial experience in which Arab society has been forced to adopt the persona of a foreign culture" (144). While one should not describe these works as feminist in orientation, Meyer continues, both novels leave openings for a feminine voice. The issue of women's status in society, Meyer concludes, is a "touchstone of social critique, one which produces an ambivalence and a sense of complicity similar to that which we can detect in late Western colonial literature with respect to the issue of colonialism" (146).36

36 In his article, Meyer gives an overview of the then current disputes in postcolonial studies and therefore his 'Works Cited' contain the following names: Said; Ashcroft, Griffith and Tiffin; Babha; Jameson; and Ahmad. There are only two items on The Sand Child: Cazenave's scholarly article and a review in the Times Literary Supplement.

152
In 1993, John D. Erickson published the first of several critical engagements with The Sand Child in which he deals with questions of gender identity and the narrative complexities of the novel.\(^{37}\) The difference when compared to the first contributions discussing gender issues is striking. Erickson's article published in boundary 2 is more theoretically grounded: he refers to several dozen books and articles, by North African scholars and writers such as Fatima Mernissi, Assia Djebar and Abdelwahab Bouhdiba as well as significant figures on the Western literary scene such as Maurice Blanchot, Jacques Derrida and Jacques Lacan. Also, the article engages in detail (a first for English-language Ben Jelloun criticism) with both aspects of the novel, the plot and the narrative structure. The veil is used in the title as a linking metaphor between the two: this is a novel about a veiled woman and about a veiled narrative.\(^{38}\)

\(^{38}\) In his 2009 article, Christian Flaugh uses the metaphor of 'operation' to establish a similar link. See Christian Flaugh, "Operating Narrative: Words on Gender Disability in Two Novels by Tahar Ben Jelloun," Forum for Modern Language Studies 45, no. 4 (2009): 411-26. Reading narrative as 'operating narrative,' Flaugh explains, "involves the study of identity as it is informed by the enforcing or operation of related norm-driven narratives" (412). Operating narrative, as understood by Flaugh, is both a process and a product that embody "the fundamental unreliability of any one master narrative in that its 'being read' reveals efforts to perpetuate the narrative" (413). Ben Jelloun's twin novels, thus, are "narratives about narrative, be it the narrative of gender, of ability, or of narrative itself" which interrogate the traditional operations (constructed mechanisms) of those same categories: gender, ability and narrative (413). Flaugh proceeds to analyze Ahmed/Zahra's mother and father in light of the identity categories of man and woman just defined, before discussing Ahmed's feigned circumcision in The Sand Child and Zahra's actual circumcision (a genital mutilation performed by her sisters as an act of revenge) in The Sacred Night. Flaugh claims that both operations are discursive and rhetorical as well as physical. Within the Maghrebian master narrative of clear distinctions between man and
The voices of the storytellers and the omniscient narrator appear to tell things in a telling way, to order and organize things as they are or are conventionally expected to be in regard to the telling; that is, the revelation of truths, of the identity of the subject, of the adherence of things and events within the novel to the system of things and events as they 'ought to be' outside the novel – Islam custom and law, in the first instance; the Western law of the narrative and the discourse of power, in the second. (Erickson, "Veiled," 51)

Describing the male semiotics ruling Maghrebian society, Erickson mentions Fatima Mernissi’s Beyond the Veil which posits the male, European gaze as the dominant gaze: “Just as the Western discourse of the father circumscribes the North African male, and just as the male colonial gaze fixes the female, so Islamic discourse fixes and circumscribes the Arab woman” (53). The gaze of the Arab woman is bound by religious belief. In order to avoid ‘zina ul-ayni’ (fornication of the eye), there is the moral imperative for veiling. Zahra resists the male gaze and therefore cannot be fixed by it. However, while it is true that this is a story about the unmaking and the remaking of the female subject [...] [it] also evolves around the unmaking/remaking of the traditional narrative of legitimation, as well as the relentless deconstruction of a coherent (male) subject/narrative. In an extended sense, Zahra becomes for Ben Jelloun a privileged metaphor for the postcolonial author striving to reconstruct an idiom expressive of his own perceptions and cultural specificity out of the shards and artefacts of the discourse, inherited from his French colonial antagonists, which he has undertaken to deconstruct. (52)

Erickson suggests that the novel is a double attempt at liberation: the North African woman is trying to liberate herself from the chains of patriarchy while the postcolonial Maghrebian writer attempts to free him/herself from the constraints of Eurocentric narrative. Thus, while “Ben Jelloun’s narrative ostensibly takes as its project the undermining of structuring values in woman, disabled bodies, such as Ahmed’s and Fatima’s, are automatically read in pejorative terms. Yet, Flaugh sees Fatima’s character as a counter-example in which "disability becomes a living subjectivity that demonstrates physical and mental productivity and that requires us to review the ways in which cultures and those who populate them see, hear and think bodily ability and its relationship to identity” (422).
Islamic society” (59), it simultaneously undermines traditional Western narrative conventions. Yet Erickson also warns us not to read the novel as a ‘simple’ act of writing back to Europe:

How different is difference if it responds to the difference already posited in a certain Western discourse on counternarration, running from Mallarmé to such contemporary writers as Lyotard, Derrida, and Foucault – all of whom, among other critics, have used the convention of discourse against itself. (61)

In his analysis of The Sand Child, Erickson accords space to several strands of literary criticism: gender studies (Mernissi, Irigaray and Nancy Miller), postcolonial studies (Said and Fanon) and postmodernism (Derrida, Barthes, Lacan). He introduces his readers to a variety of ideas from Western and non-Western thinkers concerned with sexuality, identity, narration and counternarration. Rather than attempting to present the narrative as more linear and coherent than it is (as did Cavenaze and Corredor), Erickson describes Ben Jelloun’s novels as a “narrative of impossibility, which speaks the secret languages of the Arab woman and the postcolonialist writer, for which there are no adequations, no equivalents” (64).

The following year, 1994, saw the publication of a short book chapter on the novel by Shona Elizabeth Simpson, a strongly individual interpretation that – in sharp contradiction to Erickson’s theory-laden contribution – contains not a single note or reference to other works. Simpson describes The Sand Child as an “allegory about the act of storytelling itself [that] draws into question the dominant principles of the culture which produced it - and eventually its own authority as a work” (“One Face Less,” 326). Because the protagonist must hide his/her corporeality from the world, he/she takes refuge in journal writing: “Written words themselves are given a corporeality which the spoken word does not have” (327). Yet, even the written words disappear or are misappropriated. Therefore, the fact that all narrators lack authority and than no version of the protagonist’s story can be called authentic is of vital importance in Simpson’s analysis.
By a confusing and circuitous route, The Sand Child has arrived at a fluidity of existence where individual identity and time are also circular, contrasting with the traditional Aristotelian ideas of linear time. This Western idea of linear narrative - and thus of the act of writing itself - comes under criticism by the end of The Sand Child. (330)

This fluidity is no longer granted in The Sacred Night where Ahmed/Zahra speaks for herself, in a traditional, linear narrative, claiming that all narrators of The Sand Child got his/her story wrong. As a result, Simpson argues, "while the first book presents gender as socially constructed, the sequel destroys all the multiplicity such a view creates, making a woman sex-less." Simpson concludes her argument by criticizing Ben Jelloun for "giving in to his critics and pinning down the fluidity, the multiplicity of sexuality and voices he left so intriguingly open in The Sand Child" (332).

In 1998, Erickson returned to his previous work on The Sand Child in chapter 3 of a monograph entitled Islam and Postcolonial Narrative. The chapter is split into two sections, one entitled ‘Veiled woman and veiled narrative’ (a reworking of his 1993 article) and a second untitled part which, using Todorov, deals with the interpenetration of characters, narrators and authors as well as with the folds of the narrative (based on his 1991 article). Action is not an illustration of Ben Jelloun’s narrators or characters, Erickson argues, they should rather be seen as “subserving the action, such that we encounter what Tzvetan Todorov has called an a-psychological narrative [which] throws into relief the event itself. […] Character comes to represent thereby a story that is in the making or is potential - the story of the character’s own life” (Islam and the Postcolonial Narrative, 86).

An a-psychological narrative results in "embedding and embedded narrative" in which characters migrate from one story to another, in which stories are embedded in other stories “to such a degree that levels meld; barriers separating characters and creators/tellers are breached and become traversable, fused, confused; and narrators/characters pass freely from one level to another." (87-88).
In his conclusion, Erickson describes the novel as an "inside/outside, postcolonial text" that also resembles the deconstructionist text described by Derrida, constructed around a network of differential traces referring endlessly to something other than itself, scene of a spillover having no respect for margins, frames, or partitions, actively engaged in breaking down those infrastructures of resistance supporting ideological and literary systems that attempt to assign limits in accord with a male Eurocentric discourse of power. [...] Ben Jelloun's tale points up the historical illusion of, the philosophical and epistemological insistence on, a fixed center, source or origin. (91)

In Erickson's view, The Sand Child is an amalgam that might represent a new way of writing which is simultaneously postcolonial and postmodern, and in which the body of the protagonist and the body of the text manage to forge an identity for themselves that escapes a traditional, binary definition (European versus Other).

In his 1999 article, Habib Zanzana wants to "probe the enigmatic relationship between the construction of the self (male, female or perhaps both), the contested body of the text and the concept of identity." The novel calls into question basic assumptions about gender, cultural identity, and the construction of the feminine. In a society that silences women, the protagonist chooses to write a journal which "speaks of her alienation from the feminine and her inability to identify with the world of her mother and sisters" ("Gender, Body," para. 8). Keeping a journal, according to Zanzana, is an "act of textual and sexual creation, a rebirth of gender and a deliberate unveiling of body and desire. It is also an act of survival that recalls Scheherazade" (para. 26).

The fragmented nature of the narrative reflects the fragmented construction of the feminine and, as a result, "the narrative account of Zahra's life is a suspect document in the eyes of many story-tellers and audience members who presume that it is either false or grossly inaccurate (just like her gender and identity)” (para. 10). However,

[the truth about Zahra’s identity, like the truth of the text, is deferred and disseminated but not lost. It is constantly recuperated and dispersed in the incessant flow of narrative voices that compete for the right to tell the true story of her life and reveal the secrets of her gender, body and sexuality. (para. 21)

The journal is not supposed to counteract the multitude of narrators or to establish itself as a dominant discourse, rather its aim is to “hand the reader an original narrative fragment loosely connected but solidly attached to the construction of self, to a woman’s voice, body and text” (para. 30). Ultimately, Zanzana argues, the highly self-referential text advocates an alternative notion of gender, one that “incorporates the constant shifting of the self and that embraces the instability of the sign” (para. 11).

Zanzana mentions several French theorists (Irigaray, Kristeva, Cixous, Barthes, de Beauvoir), as well as Fedwa Malti Douglass (on gender and discourse in the Islamic world). The only existing Ben Jelloun criticism he includes is Erickson’s 1993 contribution (in French).

The prominence of postcolonial thinkers and the absence of articles such as Marrouchi’s and Abdalaoui’s (not to mention of several articles in French, which similarly posit metafictional elements as central) from these first contributions already point towards an emerging ‘trend’ in Ben Jelloun criticism in English. Even in articles that engage with both plot and narrative techniques, the narrative techniques are often described as subordinated to the plot.

Intertextuality and the presence of Borges: Aizenberg and Fayad

Not surprisingly, intertextuality is one of the features that critics have focused on in the polyphonous narrative of The Sand Child, although they have done so in quite different ways. The fact that one of the narrators of 40 Derived from the Latin intertexto, meaning to intermingle while weaving. Intertextuality is a term introduced by Julia Kristeva in the late 1960s. Kristeva argued that it was time to break with traditional notions such as the ‘influences’ on an author and a text’s ‘sources.’

---

The Sand Child, the blind troubadour, is a fictionalization of Borges who advocated that all writing was rewriting and that all literature was a single text suggests that intertextuality is a major concern for Ben Jelloun in this novel.

In her 1992 article on Borges as a postcolonial precursor, Edna Aizenberg mentions Ben Jelloun’s The Sand Child alongside fictions by Rushdie and Shammas, as Borges features in novels by these authors as a character as well as a source of inspiration for ‘postmodernist’ writing. What makes Ben Jelloun a disciple of Borges, according to Aizenberg, is a distinct “poetics of pastiche”:

As in the master, the shock of discourses insinuates a postcolonial heterotopia, but one that takes Borges’s undermining strategies even further, because it is more heterotopic, embracing more multifarious and more far-flung cultural ingredients. The ‘empire’ that ‘writes back’ to the ‘center’ has been enlarged, as has the notion of what is the ‘center’, which may now be not only the culture of Europe or North America, but dominant cultures within the ‘margin’ itself. Concomitantly, there are enlarged possibilities for irreverence with fortunate consequences. (“Borges, Postcolonial Precursor,” 25)

This poetics of pastiche, Aizenberg seems to suggest, is particularly adept at voicing concerns from the ‘margins’ in a way that is congenial both to a postcolonial and a postmodernist stance towards literature. Not surprisingly, Aizenberg references postmodernist thinkers (Fokkema, Hutcheon, McHale) as well as postcolonial thinkers (Ashcroft, Griffiths and Tiffin; Ngugi wa Thiongo) in her bibliography, implicitly placing Ben Jelloun in a transnational space of world literature, alongside Rushdie and Shammas. This is the space that Graham Huggan has labelled the ‘postcolonial exotic,’ which

Rather, all signifying systems are constituted by the manner in which they transform earlier signifying systems. A literary work, therefore, is not simply the product of a single author but also defined by 1) its relationship to other texts and 2) its relationship to the structures of language itself. “Any text is constructed of a mosaic of quotations; any text is the absorption and transformation of another.” Julia Kristeva, Revolutions in Poetic Language, trans. Margaret Waller (New York: Columbia University Press, 1997), 37.

consciously and successfully markets its own marginality on the international book market.

In 1993, the French Review published a contribution by Marie Fayad on the fictional Borges in The Sand Child. In the first paragraph of her article, Fayad does not gloss over the narrative complexities of the novel but rather explains why she focuses on one single narrator: all narrators belong to the Moroccan milieu, except for the blind troubadour who narrates chapters 17 and 18. The troubadour is recognizable as Borges when he uses the words "j'ai passé ma vie à falsifier ou altérer les histoires des autres" (Ben Jelloun, "L'enfant de sable," 171). This is the first of several instances of textual closeness between the words of the fictional Borges and those of the factual Argentinean writer. Fayad argues that Ben Jelloun's strategy moves beyond intertextuality "since the character who delivers the 'hypertext' (the ulterior text) is the very same author who is the source of the 'hypotext' (the model, or original text)" ("Borges in Ben Jelloun," 295). While Fayad concentrates on chapters 17 and 18, she suggests that the Borgesian influence permeates the entire novel, "starting with the title, reminiscent of Borges's 'The Book of Sand' " (297).

Fayad uses the French edition of the novel and lists six works by Borges in her bibliography. She also includes four pieces of secondary literature on Borges, as well as Cavenaze’s article and a 1988 French article about the reception of The Sacred Night in the European press.

While Aizenberg interprets Ben Jelloun’s use of intertextuality and the fictionalization of Borges as a marker of postcoloniality, Fayad claims that the Moroccan writer uses "Borgesian devices to pay homage to Borges" and thus suggests that Ben Jelloun has a more personal relationship with and indebtedness to Borges (298).

44 For further examples, see Fayad, "Borges in Ben Jelloun," 293-97.
The Sand Child as an allegory of the postcolonial condition of Morocco: Lowe and Lezra

In her 1993 article published in Yale French Studies, Lisa Lowe advocates that postcolonial Francophone literatures of North Africa and South-East Asia "are not only symptomatic sites of the struggles and contradictions analyzed by Fanon and others, but in certain cases, the literatures also offer narrative allegories of these struggles and contradictions." Lowe interprets The Sand Child alongside Pham Van Ky's Des femmes assises ça et là as narratives that visit and revisit the question of 'colonialist' and 'nativist' nationalism. Lowe refers to the different ways one can read the two novels and explains why she has chosen a different path:

I do not read the ultimate placelessness of either protagonist as signifying the fluctuating indeterminacy of postcolonial or postmodern culture; nor do I read their postcolonial placelessness romantically, as a poignant flight of the forever exiled. Indeed, each of these novels could be read in these ways. Rather, I interpret the nomadic movements of both narratives and their protagonists as suggesting strategies for imagining resistance to the logics of cultural imperialism, logics which manage nativist reaction as the binary complement to cultural domination. ("Literary Nomadics," 45)

Using the notion of heterotopia (Foucault) and the concept of the nomadic (Deleuze and Guattari), Lowe's declared intent is to disrupt the "binary schemas which tend to condition the way in which we read and discuss not only postcolonial literature, but postcolonial situations in general" (47).

According to Lowe, The Sand Child is a novel which "allegorizes problems of colonial domination, nativist reaction, and nomadic resistance in the protagonist's ambivalent relationship to sexuality and gender roles" in which French colonial subjugation is allegorized in the figure of Ahmed/Zahra who is confronted with an impossible choice between two polar positions: male – female (54). This binarism corresponds to the nativist-colonialist binarism facing the newly formed nation of Morocco.

---

Lowe identifies two major topoi in Ben Jelloun’s narrative: First, Lowe sees Ahmed/Zahra’s ‘fetishistic’ belief in his/her simultaneous male and female sexuality as an allegory of the “splitting of the subject under colonialism” and of the “coexistence of contrary currents of personality which correspond to entirely different cultural systems” (56). Second, Lowe explains the topos of nomadic wandering as mirroring the novel’s “dispersed modes of narration” (57). Three narrators are vital in this regard: the ending of Amar’s story reflects a ‘nativist’ logic (Ahmed finds peace and redemption through the study of Islamic religious texts), while Salem’s violent account of Zahra’s rape and death is meant to represent the worst allegory of colonialism. Fatuma, the only female narrator and a nomadic being herself, constitutes an alternative to the binary model ‘nativist’ versus ‘colonialist’: “through her extensive travels, she has moved away from her past dilemma of ambivalent gender and sexuality; she is also no longer confined to colonial or native territories, and describes her freedom to dwell in any site she wishes” (58).

Lowe sees The Sand Child as a novel that thematizes “the colonized subject as an important site of cultural and political contestation” and which subverts the Oedipal discourse as a powerful instrument of colonialism (61, emphasis in the original). It refigures and displaces privileged psychoanalytical explanations of gender acquisition, including castration anxiety, disavowal, and fetishism, and therefore suggests the importance of our attendance to the various sites of splitting in the colonized subject as one part of theorizing colonial and postcolonial resistances to domination. (61)

Through its use of sources and argument, Lowe’s contribution locates itself within postcolonial studies (quoting Fanon and Bhabha) and postmodernism (Deleuze and Guattari, Soja). Lowe also refers to the Oedipus complex (Freud and Lacan) as well as the Anti-Oedipal projects of Deleuze and Guattari and of feminists such as Katja Silverman and Jessica Benjamin.46

---

46 Aparna Halpe argues that the issue of gendered subjectivity in The Sand Child is best understood through a Freudian paradigm. She sees the novel as a reworking of Freud’s theories of Eros and Thanatos (life and death drives). See Aparna Halpe, “The Problem of
However, Lowe does not refer to a single French contribution on The Sand Child or by a Maghrebian writer or critic. The only exception is a brief mention of the Tunisian writer Albert Memmi.

Overall, Lowe posits Ben Jelloun’s œuvre in a transnational space of literature that is both ‘postcolonial’ and ‘Francophone.’ This literature is written in French by writers from the former colonies and it engages with issues of domination and subordination in an innovative way that describes but no longer subscribes to the reactive model (Europe versus its Other). Rather, Lowe argues, alternatives to this binarism can be found in the nomadic figures such as Fatuma and in the fragmented narrative techniques.

In a book chapter published in 2008, Esther Lezra reads The Sand Child in a similar way: as “articulating violent subjection of [...] peripheral bodies as a necessary moment in the disruption of the unifying and inevitably stifling structures of the neo-colonial and gender discourses around Moroccan independence (1956).” Just as Lowe had done, Lezra also uses a second text, The Pagoda by Patricia Powell, to strengthen her argument. Both texts use “the errant and cross-dressing body as a metaphor for the act of outlining an alternative subjectivity” which points “to a common preoccupation with taking a critical position vis-à-vis the oppressive elements in the ideological makeup of colonialist and national structures that rely on notions of fixed and normative identities” (Lezra, “[Ab]Errant Bodies,” 102-3). At the start of her article, Lezra partly distances herself from Lowe’s approach to The Sand Child:

Lowe understands the father’s nationalist utterance as an imposition of the neo-colonial will onto the female body, while I would like to read the imposition of masculinity onto the female body as a gesture that ‘takes back’ and rewrites what dominant European discourses have represented as the figure of the colonized-feminized and penetrated body of Morocco. (102n1).

---

The multiple and complex narrative strands are thus seen as serving a specific purpose “to reclaim a community voice and assert heterogenous subjectivities in the face of external, flattening colonial aggression” (82). In Lezra’s view, Ben Jelloun draws on specific narrative devices in order to “map a collective space not entirely defined by colonization within which the community that he addresses might be able to refashion itself” (83). The destruction of the marketplace and the disappearance of the first narrator are seen as a “neocolonial attempt to eliminate [a] generative knot of cultural activity” which is however “countered by the emergence of a multiplicity of narrators that come forth to replace the eliminated teller” (86). Narrative authority is decentred, yet a community forms around a “sense of collective and individual responsibility to each other as well as to the story and its characters” (87). The story is (and has to be) retold several times “in what seems to be a deliberate act—on the part of those who take over the retelling—of rebuilding a destroyed community” (88). Thus, Lezra concludes her analysis of The Sand Child, the disorder and errancy with which [Ahmed/Zahra’s] story is inflected can be understood in terms of an act of resistance to destructive neocolonial structures. This resistance itself enacts violence on the female body, for it is the body upon which the violent processes of narrating, erasing and re-membering are played out. (89)

To strengthen her argument, Lezra uses texts by Anderson (on imagined communities), Butler (on identity), Woodhull (on feminism and decolonization in the Maghreb), Mignolo (on coloniality and border thinking) and Mernissi (on Islam and democracy). She also references theoretical writings on the Caribbean and the Subcontinent as subaltern, postcolonial spaces. Only two items of Ben Jelloun criticism are present in the ‘Works Cited’: a monograph by Jarrod Hayes (2000) who also reads the representation of gender as a national allegory (see below), and Lowe’s article.
Lowe and Lezra both see Ben Jelloun's novel as exemplifying the postcolonial condition in general and as an act of writing and resisting the grievances of a specific, Moroccan, 'reality.'

Intertextuality and intersexuality: Harvey

In 1997, Robert Harvey contributed an article on The Sand Child to an edited collection of essays on gender studies and French-language writing. Starting off with the familiar criticism that Ben Jelloun "(perhaps yielding to his market) had honed The Sacred Night into a prize-winning, euphonic, and seamless parody of Arabic narrative traditions," Harvey praises The Sand Child as a "generalized intertext on the verge of cacophony" struggling with the "instability of intersexuality" ("Purloined Letters," 226). In order to describe the social conditioning that Ahmed/Zahra undergoes, Harvey resorts to the metaphor of 'coinage', which is also used in the novel itself: the protagonist's maleness is stamped upon him/her like a coin is stamped but then the coinage fades.

In his discussion of the Borgesian intertext, Harvey refers to two previous articles on intertextuality by Erickson and Gontard. Harvey states that Ben Jelloun comes very close to actually plagiarizing Borges ("unavowed literary borrowing") and that "Borges is not just any author to steal from, since most of his work questions the concept of originality in literature, the significance of the signature, and the very notion of authorship" (229, emphasis in the original). Ben Jelloun has adopted a 49 Erickson also expresses the view that The Sacred Night is inferior to The Sand Child and that Ben Jelloun might have deliberately changed his writing strategy for the sequel in order to "specifically appeal to the Goncourt jury, the general public, and the popular press" (Erickson 'Veiled', 48n2).

---

technique of “intertextual deviation” that imitates “the nomadic survival tactics that the intersexual sand child adopts” (230).

Harvey weaves together several strands of literary criticism: psychoanalytical criticism (Freud and Kristeva), postmodernism (Deleuze and Guattari) and postcolonial studies (comparing Ben Jelloun’s narrative strategies to those of other Maghrebian writers, such as Abdelkebir Khatibi and Assia Djebar). According to Harvey, the intertextuality in Ben Jelloun results less from postmodern paralogism or metafiction than from the author’s incorporation of the Berber oral tradition of his native Morocco and from the intertwining of speaking and writing in Islamic culture. Thus the Koran and the 1001 Nights – two paradigmatic Islamic texts of the voice – have massive presence in The Sand Child. (241)

Ultimately, Harvey argues, it does not matter whether we define the intertextuality of this rhizomatic novel as “the apotheosis of modernism or an exemplum of the postmodern”: it simply stretches the “limits of decipherability” (244). By making Borges a central character, Ben Jelloun reclaims Borges for the “decentering project of minor literature” as defined by Deleuze and Guattari: “By shunning [...] the genealogy of culture fostered and nurtured in the salons of European capitals, Ben Jelloun transplants Borges into the rhizome where his Morocco can easily connect with the criollo quarters of Latin American medinas” (245).

Harvey seems to suggest that, while intertextuality and intersexuality mirror one another, the narrative techniques are at least as important as, if not more important than, the plot developments. While agreeing on the general working consensus that seems to have established itself by the late 1990 - ‘The Sand Child is best read as an example of postcolonial literature investigating gender and national identity and which uses disruptive narrative techniques,’ - Harvey is prone to accentuate the latter over the former. He does not, however, refer to Marrouchi, Abdalaoui or items of criticism written in French which argue along similar lines. Overall, articles that investigate gender identity still prevail, as the next few sections will show.
Masculinity and virility: Ouzgane

Lahoucine Ouzgane’s 1997 article and his 2011 reworking thereof aim to redress the lack of critical work on masculinity (rather than femininity) in criticism of Maghrebian literature. Most of the attention in gender studies has been on the construction of Islamic femininity, Ouzgane argues, and the rare existing studies of Islamic masculinities concentrate on homosexuality and homoeroticism. Patriarchal structures of society do not only marginalize women but shape the violent hierarchies structuring the relationships between men themselves [...] Because women are not the centre of men’s experience (other men are), misogyny is actually fuelled by something deeper – by the fear of emasculation by other men, the fear of humiliation, the fear of being not so manly” (Ouzgane, “Rape Continuum,” 69).

The male characters in Ben Jelloun’s novels all reduce masculinity to virility, Ouzgane argues, a state of affairs that can only be sustained through recurring acts of violence.

Ouzgane gives two examples from The Sand Child: the rivalry between Ahmed’s father and his brothers and the story of Antar, a woman disguising herself as man and known as a ruthless warrior chieftain. In a society in which virility is a synonym for manhood, not being able to procreate or being able to produce only girls is a sign of weakness. In fact, the North African Arabic words for ‘manhood’ and ‘virility’ are almost interchangeable. Through Antar’s character, “Ben Jelloun offers us the spectacle of the most masculine of men, the soldier, elaborately arrayed, in transgression of gender fixities” (Ouzgane, “Masculinity and Virility,”11).

Ouzgane even gives the example of serial rapist Hajji Hamid Tabet (sentenced to death in 1993 for having raped over five hundred women in the space of thirteen years) as proof that Ben Jelloun’s texts are “indeed

---

52 See Ouzgane, “Rape Continuum,” 78n7.
inseparable from their context" ("Masculinity and Virility," 12). For Ouzgane, literature clearly fulfills a documentary function, describing mentalities and gender constructions in a particular society. As a consequence of the focus being on plot, the aesthetic dimension of the novel is downplayed.

Genuineness, authority and authenticity: Gauch

In her 1999 article, which also forms the basis of chapter 3 of her 2007 monograph, Suzanne Gauch criticizes some of the accepted notions of postcolonial studies, namely "the emasculating effects of colonization upon the colonized" and the acknowledgement of "colonialism's role in furthering the oppression of colonized women" as they fail to question "occluded assumptions regarding the body, particularly the female body."53 While Gauch agrees that The Sand Child is a novel that combines "elements of sexual difference, dominance, independence and national identity, and postcolonial consciousness" she wants to counteract a tendency in previous Ben Jelloun criticism that took for granted the femininity of Ahmed:

Relying upon a notion of biology as naturally determinative of gender, such readings designate the colonial period as the unnatural suppression of some authentic female essence. To overcome the unnatural effects of colonialism is to recover or remake a "natural" female subject. Such reasoning implicitly predicates the liberation of Ahmed's female subjectivity on the recreation of an authentic sociocultural identity uncontaminated by the aberrant structures of colonialism. (Gauch, "Telling the Tale," 180).

Gauch takes up position by criticizing other interpreters, Erickson and Lowe in particular, for contending that "Ahmed/Zahra is a woman cruelly forced to disavow her female body and desires, with her socialization as a male either, in Erickson's view, contesting the colonizer's emasculation of the colonized, or alternately, in Lowe's reading, reflecting French colonial policies of assimilation" (183). In Gauch's view, the protagonist does not have innate female desires; rather, the text actually condemns notions of sexual identity exclusively linked to biology and unsettles "categories long taken for granted by analyses of colonialism, offering us an important glimpse into the gendering of postcolonial identity" (181). Using Butler’s concept of the performativity of sex, Gauch argues that Ahmed actually revels in the narratives that constrain him as they heighten his perception of the constructedness of gender. It is not his body, but his crippled wife Fatima, whoprovokes Ahmed to question his identity.

In the second part of her article, Gauch moves from an engagement with the genuineness of the protagonist’s gender to the question how the different narrators claim authority, as both symbolize the struggle of decolonized nations to recuperate a ‘genuine’ identity. Ben Jelloun exposes different ideas about authenticity and authority as the novel progresses: authority derived from the possession of the protagonist’s diary; authority derived from one’s proclaimed position as an eyewitness; authority derived from a shared fate. The blind troubadour’s function is to make a mockery of the “quest for narrative resolution” (198). The narrative strategies deployed by Ben Jelloun in this novel, Gauch concludes her 1999 article, serve to destabilize the binaries of masculinity and femininity as well as to put in question simplistic formulations of postcolonial national identities.

In the 2007 book chapter, Gauch includes an analysis of the trends in criticism of The Sand Child up to that point in time:

Scholars have discerned in the story of Ahmed/Zahra allegories of bicultural or nomadic postcolonial identities, a critique of Islam’s influence on the psyches of its adherents, a condemnation of colonialism’s impact on gendered social relations, a commentary on the gender insubordination at the root of national identity, and a reflection of a culturally specific, postcolonial, gender theory. (“Story Without a Face,” 59)

As examples, Gauch quotes Lowe, Erickson, Brand and Hayes (for the latter two, see below) but does not refer to any of the existing French-language contributions about the novel of which there are several dozens by 2007.

---

54 Here, Gauch’s claim resembles that of Lowe and Erickson whom she had criticized earlier on in her contribution.
(see appendix II). She does, however, refer to the 'usual suspects' of postcolonial and gender studies (Fanon, Butler) and Fatima Mernissi as a representative voice from the Maghreb. Although some critics, such as Gauch and Harvey, have sufficient competence to prefer their own translations of the French novel to Sheridan's, they do not find it necessary to incorporate more than token items of criticism on the novel written in French.

As Gauch's monograph uses Shahrazad (Scheherazade) as a copula, she argues that The Sand Child, "building on what Mernissi deemed the insolent lesson of Princess Budur — that the difference between the sexes is but a matter of dress—" proposes that we need to reimagine the construct of sex. Gauch argues that narratives such as The Sand Child expose the "fantasy of rigid and impermeable boundaries between Occident and Orient, the West and the Arab world" which is especially difficult for postcolonial writers when "regional particularism is assumed to dominate their aesthetics" (67). Thus, Gauch concludes in 2007, "through his many doubles, the storytellers, Ben Jelloun entices those readers in search of an ethnographic performance of Moroccan authorship and then, through a radical foregrounding of fictionality, turns such a project to ridicule" (Telling the Tale," 79-80).

Gauch suggests that The Sand Child is a most interesting narrative for exactly its foregrounding of fictionality. While she is not alone in advocating this stance, questions of gender emerging from the plot seem to be more important to many other critics: the arrival of the new millennium saw more articles on queer sexuality and queer nationality, on the masking and unmasking of gender, as well as on androgyny.

The Sand Child as allegory of gender: Hayes

I have already discussed gender approaches but want to treat Jarrod Hayes separately as he is the first to apply queer theory, while also stressing the literariness of the novel (which Cazenave, Corredor and El-Hoss fail to do). In a chapter of his monograph on marginal sexualities in the Maghreb, "Becoming a Woman: Tahar Ben Jelloun's Allegory of Gender," Hayes describes the twin novels as telling "not only the story of one individual's becoming a woman, but also the story of gender, a narration of the process through which gender is stamped onto the bodies and minds of those belonging to the 'second sex.' Hayes proposes to read The Sacred Night through the lens of The Sand Child (rather than the other way round) in an attempt to reopen questions seemingly closed in the second, linear, narrative: “Instead of narrating the liberation of a female from the imposed gender of man, instead of narrating the return to the roots of womanhood, La nuit sacrée is about the impossible task of such a narrative” (Queer Nations, 173).

Hayes also sees his own reading as challenging the interpretations seemingly authorized by Ben Jelloun, who in an interview stated that he wanted to describe a process of emancipation, “a woman’s struggle to become what she should have been had she not been the victim of an aggression against her sexuality and all her being.” Becoming a woman, Hayes argues, involves forgetting the violence at the origin of gender, “the violent stamping of the body by language” (174). Thus, “for the gender system to work, gender as performance must be forgotten, replaced by gender naturalized and joined to its source, biology” (176). Zahra’s decision to live as a woman also means giving up the status of a full citizen and accepting that of a servant (178-9).

Towards the end of the chapter, Hayes engages with Lowe’s reading of the novel as an allegory of the nation. While Lowe’s reading seems to imply the notion of the protagonist’s journey towards womanhood as liberation (an interpretation that Hayes questions), he is especially interested in what Lowe calls ‘literary nomadics’ as one way of resisting both colonialism and nationalism and of “disrupting narratives of a return to national origins” (180). Both gender and nation are performative: gender is 57 In the ‘Works Cited’ of the monograph, we find four of the previous items of criticism on the novel written in English (Cazenave, Lowe, Marrouchi and Mehta) and four written in French (Déjeux, Erickson, Maazaoui and Saigh Bousta).

---

an individual, nation a collective performance (neither are naturally given, they are both internalized). National identity as performance both uses the origin of official nationalist discourse and disrupts the centrality of that origin. National identity, still useful in this concept, becomes a sort of drag. [...] Ben Jelloun’s model of the performance of gendered identity is thus simultaneously a model of national identity, where the Nation involved is inescapably queer. In this vision of becoming/performing woman, the relation between nation and Woman is one of exclusion: The more Zahra becomes woman, the more she is denied an officially recognized identity. (180-81)

Comparing Ahmed/Zahra and Silence: Ramond Jurney and Hess

In her 2001 article on the masking and unmasking of gender, Florence Ramond Jurney analyses The Sand Child in tandem with a text from the thirteenth century, Le roman de Silence as both narratives deal with the socio-political origins of transvestism and its consequences. There are three ways in which the protagonists (both biologically female but raised as males) are masked: by naming (an act exercised by the fathers with the complicity of the mothers); by the ritual of clothing (wearing clothes reserved to men and hiding female bodily characteristics) and by the usurpation of education (education is subverted by females to learn and do what is usually reserved for men only). While the masking is initiated by the masculine, the protagonists are soon “decrowned” (Bakhtin’s term) and can be “symbolically seen as clowns who usurp the power of the King in that they usurp the power of the masculine” (Ramond Jurney, “Secret Identities,” 8). The process of unmasking is aimed at proclaiming the importance of Nature over Nurture, Ramond Jurney concludes, yet everything returns to the order defined by the masculine. Therefore, “neither Le roman de Silence nor L’enfant de sable is a feminist success: Ahmed/Zahra dies in exile without giving the reader many more details, and Silence’s wedding is followed by a very abrupt ending” (9). Yet, Ramond Jurney argues, Nurture wins over Nature in Ben Jelloun’s novel: “the mask that was deceiving in one way (physically) can continue to deceive in another (culturally), leaving the feminine with the possibility of shaking patriarchal society enough so that it can assert the multiple expressions of its identity independent of the authority and the schemes of the masculine" (9).

In a familiar move, Ramond Jurney glosses over the existence of multiple narrators and states that Ahmed/Zahra has died, failing to mention that this is only one of several versions of the protagonist's life and that Zahra actually rises to speak herself in the sequel.

The 'Works Cited' consists of five items: besides the two novels at the centre of the article, Ramond Jurney quotes Bakhtin's study of Rabelais, an article on the Roman de Silence by Elizabeth Waters and Cazenave's 1991 article treated above. However, remarkably, no mention is made of a previous critical comparative study of the two novels in question: in 1998, Erica Hess had published an essay entitled "Passing the Test of Truth: Gender as Performance in Two French Narratives, Medieval and Modern" which also discusses the thematic and linguistic hybridity of the two protagonists, Silence and Ahmed.59

Hoss starts by stressing that both texts portray a "debate between Nature and Nurture, or Culture (made explicit in the Roman de Silence, implied in L'enfant de sable)" which echoes the identity struggle of Ahmed and Silence ("Passing the Test of Truth," 42). Following Butler's theory that gender is a discursively constrained performative act, Hoss shows in several examples how both Silence and Ahmed pass as males in society. However, as far as The Sand Child is concerned, with increasing frequency, narrative ruptures and conflicts draw the reader's attention to the inconstancies of appearances and to the inadequacies of reason. In an explicit and rigorous fashion, this novel underscores physical and narrative instability at every juncture. The "truth," always suspect and qualified, can only ever be that which passes for true. And nothing passes for long. (46)

The forces of Nature and Nurture seem to want to compel both protagonists into a single gender and constantly "work to reposition both Silence and Ahmed away from his/her hybrid third space" (47). Nature's/Nurture's resistance to their hybridity, Hess concludes, "indicates the degree to which the suggestion of multiple 'foundational categories of identity' (Butler) – sex, gender, the body – disturbs and threatens the accepted regimes of power and discourse" (47).

Besides seven items of criticism on the Roman de Silence and Butler's Gender Troubles, Hess refers to a book on the formation of Islamic laws of inheritance and two histories of women in the Middle East. The 'Works Cited' also include Simpson's "One Face Less" and Erickson's article in French as well as another article in French by Anne Chevalier (see appendix II).

Both Jurney Ramond and Hess provide a survey of the theme of gender identity in medieval and modern literature written in French. Neither critic reflects on the fact that theirs is an undertaking that presumes a dubious continuity. Can the two texts in question simply be called 'French narratives,' as Hess does in her title and how far do the perceived thematic similarities (women forced to pose as men) really constitute a valid departure point for comparison? Comparing The Sand Child to another text which deals with a similar theme is common practice, though, as the next section shows.

The Sand Child as androgynous construct: Brand

Hanita Brand describes the aim of her 2000 article as an analysis of the production of meaning in literature that involves androgynous constructs, with a particular focus on three aspects: the paraliterary (the 'why'; connections between author and protagonist), the metaliterary (the 'how'; literary themes in cultural and social debates) and the literary (the 'what'; historically charged narratives). As examples of literary works interested in androgyny, Brand uses The Sand Child and a short story by Isaac Bashevis

---

Singer, “Yentl, the Yeshiva Boy.” According to Brand, these two texts are “remarkably close in their perspective, theme and literary approach” (“Fragmentary,” 58): they are both tales of women who “masquerade” (Brand’s term) as men. Later, Brand is forced to admit that while Yentl chooses to masquerade as a man, Ahmed is never given that choice.

On the paraliterary level, Brand argues, one notices a special relationship “between the (male) authors and their (originally female) protagonists” which is easily explained: “Both Tahar Ben Jelloun and Isaac Bashevis Singer are culturally transplanted authors. Theirs is not a gendered androgyny but a cultural one” (60). On the metaliterary level, Brand continues, “these texts can help us grasp the social and psychological dimensions of androgyny, both in their problems and possibility. As literary texts, the plots present, on the whole, a mirror image of reality – in this case, a distorted mirror image” (65).

As far as the literary level is concerned, Brand uses Annis Pratt’s distinction between male and female matrices of the Bildungsroman: the male grid describes a linear development from childhood to adult life that results in the acceptance of social rules; the female grid entails disruption and indeterminate endings. If one observes The Sand Child and “Yentl” carefully, Brand proceeds, their formal features reveal that the meta-literary thematic elements have corresponding literary manifestations. The structural ‘marriage of opposites’ throughout the stories is built around the polarity androgyny-vs-society, as one is constantly played out against the other in a power struggle, with few ideal moments of easy balance. The stories oscillate between a regular plot situation, with a main character and a social background (i.e., a male plot line), and an unconventional situation, with a retreat of the protagonist on the one hand and society’s coming to the fore on the other (i.e., a female plot line). (72-73)

In both narratives, the first half is male-gridded and things proceed in a regular, smooth manner “as the youngsters act fast and have the upper hand, deceiving society, getting married, and settling into the regular social patterns of their milieu" (73). Later, in the female-gridded part, disaster strikes and “Ahmed withdraws to his room, refusing to see anyone, awaiting death” (73).

---

61 Brand refers to The Sacred Night not as the sequel of The Sand Child, but as “a novel that has the same theme” (81n2).

Sixteen pages into her article, Brand has not mentioned the multiple narrators yet and makes the plot appear more straightforward than it is. Next, Brand develops her methodology based on semiotic concepts: the reader is given definitions of Umberto Eco’s ‘reverse entropy’ and Riffaterre’s concept of the ‘hypogram’ as well as an explanation for the author’s preference for the term ‘paragram.’ Confusingly, the reader is asked to understand the latter more like Riffaterre’s hypogram than Saussure’s paragram (73-76).

Only then, nineteen pages into her article, must Brand admit that “the narration concerning Ahmed’s life is set inside a ‘framework plot’ which denies its status as reality. This is achieved by causing the inner plot to be understood as some kind of a folk tale being told in a town square by a series of raconteurs” (76). The frame story, as Brand calls it, sends readers mixed messages, at times affirming “the existence of an attainable inner story (in a male plot line),” at times denying it (in a female plot line) (77). The focus on Ahmed’s life story, which is portrayed as more linear than it is, results in the neglect of the novel’s narrative complexity. In her conclusion, Brand shows her understanding of the nature and function of literature: formal elements, plot line and theme join each other “to engage in the most enriching dialogue of all – that between literature and life” (80-81).

Language, sexual identity, gender: Rye, Hamil and Saunders

In her 2000 article, Gill Rye establishes a strong link between language and sexual identity in The Sand Child. Relying on Cixous and Freud as well as gendered reader response theory, Rye’s main argument is that language plays a crucial role in the construction and de-construction of sexual identity.

62 Besides items of feminist criticism dealing with androgyny (Phyllis Rackin, Marilyn French, Ben Agger, Shulamit Firestone and Elaine Showalter) and some texts about semiotics, Brand refers to three critical studies on Singer in the ‘Works Cited.’ However, there is not a single item of Ben Jelloun criticism in either English or French.

Ben Jelloun’s main aim, she claims, is to encourage his readers to challenge their own assumptions about sexual identity. Following Cixous, Rye sees reading as a gendered activity, "a dialogue which takes place within a framework of (changing) power relations" ("Uncertain Readings," 532). The Sand Child explores the "biological, socio-cultural, psychological and linguistic dimensions of gender" (534). Rye also addresses the fact that it is a male writer, Ben Jelloun, to constitute the protagonist as a (female) speaking subject: the woman is given voice only with the permission and by the action of a man" and suggests that rather than enabling marginal voices to speak for themselves, Ben Jelloun’s intercession actually achieves the opposite effect: it feeds into and reinforces patriarchal and Eurocentric perspectives of Moroccan women as exotic sexual objects.®

In a 2000 book chapter, Mustafa Hamil asks the question whether socio-political revolts can only be launched from the site of the woman’s body and language. The female body is seen as a space where religious, cultural, economic, sexual and political discourses intersect. "No displacement [...] of the Law/Name-of-the-Father can be better achieved than through the evocation of woman’s body."® While Rye sees Ben Jelloun’s adoption of a female voice as questionable, Hamil approves of the author’s strategy:

Through the act of writing-the-woman, Ben Jelloun embarks on a triple journey: an ontological, linguistic, and historical exploration of his own voice and identity. When the woman speaks, her voice, like that of the author, sounds like her voice but not quite, and her desires and fantasies cast on the plane of writing function as a metadiscourse intended to disrupt the discourse of the Other/Father. ("Rewriting Identity," 62)

Hamil deploys French theorists such as Lacan, de Certeau, Derrida, Barthes and Deleuze and Guattari as well as Bakhtin and Todorov to bolster his argument. He also refers to Rachid Boudjedra’s writing as similar to Ben Jelloun’s and points out the similarities between The Sand Child and

---

64 See Rye, "Uncertain Readings," 536 and 539n11.
Rushdie’s Midnight’s Children: the birth of the protagonists is linked to the birth of their nations; they are both condemned to a fragmented life. Several Maghrebian critics appear in the ‘Works Cited’: one item written in English (an article on mother-son relationships by Hedi Abdel-Jaoud) and three in French published in North Africa (Boughali, Memmes and Mezgueldi; see appendix II). While European theorists still feature prominently, Hamil is one of the few critics to include more than the token Maghrebian critic.

In “Decolonizing the Body: Gender, Nation, and Narration in Tahar Ben Jelloun’s L’enfant de sable” (2006), Rebecca Saunders explicitly places the novel “in a theoretical dialogue with postcolonial and gender studies,” arguing that Ben Jelloun’s aim is to show how gender is a colonization of the body or how both gender and colonization are mechanism aimed at fabricating subjects. Saunders claims that Ben Jelloun establishes a “kind of fluid triangulation in which the body is the nation, the nation is the narrative, and the narrative is the body” (“Decolonizing the Body,” 138).

Ahmed’s life is linked to the life of Morocco, and in the newspaper announcement after Ahmed’s birth, the two are already put in relation to one another. The protagonist’s troubled gender identity mirrors the troubled Moroccan decolonizing process. Saunders also suggests parallels to Salman Rushdie’s Midnight Children. The fundamental question which Ahmed asks himself (‘from what forces do I need to liberate myself?’) applies to Morocco, as well. In this interpretation, Salem’s, Amar’s and Fatuma’s alternative endings to Ahmed/Zahra’s story allegorize possible developments for Morocco. In a further development, the body becomes indistinguishable from the narrative. The main narrator claims that he alone has access to the story, that in a quite cannibalistic act, he has merged with the book.

The similarities between gender and colonization/colonized subjects, according to Saunders, are several: first, both women and colonies are given child status (they both need to be taken care of); second, their status as human beings is put in question and they are only ever defined in terms of relation to men/masters; third, attempts to define women and colonies are negative only: uncivilized, abnormal, underdeveloped; fourth, they are often described as deficient beings. So perhaps the question whether Ahmed is trapped in the wrong ‘sex’ is not the right one to ask, Saunders suggests. Rather, we should ask ourselves whether Ben Jelloun is actually criticizing the whole gender system as such.

---

Saunders merges gender and postcolonial theory (Butler and Bhabha) to argue that gender and culture are not a priori existing categories but normative ideals. These ideals are reiterated in common usage (therefore performativity is a key concept) and the question of agency cannot be ignored. Precisely because identity comes into being through repetition, it can be altered. Rather than losing the language of the body (whether female or national), we should see these concepts as forces of discursive demands with the capacity to draw out the materiality of the body.

Magical realism: Erickson

We encountered John D. Erickson before as one of the first critics to write on the corporeality of protagonist and narrative. In fact, he is the most prolific critic writing in English on Ben Jelloun, having established himself as a specialist on nomadic writing and magical realism in the Maghreb.

Erickson uses Franz Roh’s definition of the term ‘magical realism’ (“depiction of the supernatural in a realistic setting”) as well as the more common usage of the term for narratives by Latin-American writers that merge fantasy and reality (“Metoikoi and Magical Realism,” 427). Erickson claims that Ben Jelloun’s writings from the 1980s, and The Sand Child especially, “best exemplify magical realism and its Maghrebian form of nomadic thought” (“Magical Realism and Nomadic Writing,” 250). In adopting techniques of magical realism that remind the reader of Julio Cortázar, Raymond Queneau and Gabriel García-Márquez, Ben Jelloun “levels” narrative (Erickson’s term): he deprives the master discourse (Western, linear, realistic mode of narration) of its value and privileged position and makes this form of narration one amongst many possible discourses. Time and space collapse, gender distinctions are blurred over and over, characters and objects are thus destabilized and become tainted with surreality. The narrative levels interpenetrate one another (is Fatuma really Ahmed/Zahra, her avatar or a symbol of all Moroccan women?) to a level that causes nothing but indeterminacy. North African narratives such as Ben Jelloun’s and Abdelkebir Khatibi’s are remarkably close to “postcolonial discourses from other non-Western cultures in Africa and other areas of the world” (“Metoikoi and Magical Realism,” 428). In the narrative universe of Ben Jelloun the coexistence of fantasy and reality mark “his special brand of magical realism and, more generally, the alternative postcolonial discourse of the “non-Greeks,” the metoikos, the météques” (444).

Erickson devotes a portion of his 1995 article to an analysis of chapters 17 and 18, narrated by the blind troubadour to elucidate the narrative complexities of the novel. The blind troubadour operates on multiple levels:

a fictional replication of the historical author Jorge Luis Borges, he functions as one of the second-level (intradiegetic) narrators and is in that role a character in the tale of the first-level (extradiegetic) narrator; he functions also on various metadiegetic levels in his direct interactions with the character of the mysterious woman visitor. [...] The dream related in chapter 18 leaves us to speculate that the BT [sic] also may be dreamt by another, by Zahra, the character of another storyteller, and that he might consequently inhabit a still more remote level – a meta-meta-metadiegetic level!” (440-41)

This interpenetration of narrative levels, according to Erickson, is a distancing mechanism adopted by Ben Jelloun and his fellow Maghrebian writers as a “protective covering that allows them to lead their own existence equidistant from sameness (assimilation) and otherness (alienation), to exist in the face of the power play of Western culture as well as traditional Islamic culture” (441).

In an effort to rewrite the language of the coloniser, Erickson concludes, both Khatibi and Ben Jelloun efface all metanarratives: they start anew, replacing pseudo-African (neocolonialist) discourses with an African discourse. The magical realism of The Sand Child is one form of narrative renewal under the auspices of the larger project of creating a counterliterature that does not follow Western imperatives.

Concluding remarks: Worldliness in literary criticism

The survey of English-language criticism on The Sand Child has shown that critics primarily frame the novel within the discourse of postcoloniality. This seems inevitable, Nasrin Qader argues, because the critical and theoretical discourse on African literatures, both within and without the continent, has been dominated by the political, social, or anthropological, rendering texts documents. Even those who admit that the literary is not the same phenomenon as the social, the political, or the cultural have not always managed to escape the pitfalls of appropriating literature for these domains.

Twenty years ago Abdalaoui argued along similar lines:

In France (and elsewhere in the West), Moroccan novels are still universally read as sociological documents (the most highly prized being those that deal with the condition of Muslim women). This propensity reinforces ethnocentric views and expectations inherited from the previous century. [...] The criteria that prevail on both sides of the Mediterranean are highly arbitrary: in France, critics argue about whether a text has literary merit; in Morocco, they debate whether to label it "authentic," whether to admit it into the national cultural canon. ("Moroccan Novel," 31)

Abdalaoui points towards the major difference between French and Moroccan criticism. My survey of English-language literary criticism shows that, here too, the prevailing tendency is to read Ben Jelloun's novels as related to the social, the political, or the cultural (either seeing literature as document or commentary on those spheres of life). Discussions about the literary merit of Maghrebian literature (common in French-language criticism) are rare. Also, there seems to be a tendency in the criticism surveyed in this chapter to accept Ben Jelloun's narrative as 'authentically'

---

Moroccan, Maghrebian, African or Francophone (very often an issue with Maghrebian critics). The organizing trope of postcolonial studies presents Ben Jelloun's work as a site of struggle and, when it acknowledges the narrative complexities, very often sees these as strategies in line with the trope of resistance.

Perhaps it is not so surprising then that Ben Jelloun criticism in English very much functions in parallel to French Ben Jelloun criticism: there is hardly any cross-fertilization to speak of.®® French thought does travel across into English-language criticism but it is canonical critics such as Deleuze, Guattari, Derrida, Kristeva or Cixous whose theories are used in conjunction with prominent names of postcolonialism (Fanon, Said, Bhabha) and gender studies (Butler). The only notable exception seems to be Fatima Mernissi's works on the status of women in Islam. As Mernissi is a sociologist by training, her approach chimes with the major currents in postcolonial criticism and gender studies.

Ultimately, what emerges quite clearly is that critics arguing for the value of a given literary text simultaneously argue for the value of the particular stance in literary criticism they advocate and for their own position as experts in the field. In an environment in which novels such as The Sand Child are portrayed as voicing the concerns of the 'Other' (the silenced woman, the writer from a former colony writing against dominating Western discourse), some of the critics also think that they have an ethical duty to write about this 'special' kind of literature:

As critics, readers and writers, we contribute to the disordering of dominant discourses by recognizing, pointing to and pushing the limits that dominant narratives would impose. We contribute to the remembering of erased and forgotten experiences and voices by pointing to the traces and echoes left by these acts of violence and historical forgetting. (Lezra, "[Ab]Errant Bodies," 102)

®® The same seems to be true in reverse, perhaps because French-language critics are known to have to date resisted most of postcolonial theory which, as we have seen, is the dominant way in which English-language academics read novels coming from the 'margins.' See Michal Krzykawski, "Réticences françaises à l'égard des Postcolonial Studies: entre le soubresaut républicain et le hoquet francophone," Romanica Silesiana 6 (2011): 76-88.
Lezra’s claim that literary criticism is a powerful and morally robust exercise conceals two aspects that have emerged quite clearly from the analysis in this chapter: 1) the critical readings are also informed by the wish of the academics to position themselves within the literary field; 2) while postcolonial and gender studies were initially established to counteract and subvert dominant ways of reading literature, they have by now themselves become dominant forms of critical discourse. How subversive are postcolonial readings of The Sand Child as a site of struggle for gender and national identity when they are performed dozens of times? Postcolonial and gender studies have undoubtedly established themselves as dominant approaches in the case of Ben Jelloun’s novel; and academics working through this critical lens seem to be largely ignoring contributions that offer a different approach (those that read the novel as a singular instance of storytelling) and which do not fit into their agenda.

An important part of the habitus of practitioners of world literature is worldliness, which I understand as openness to the world, its literature and opinions about it. Yet, when it comes to taking account of criticism written in other languages and other countries, much research seems rather parochial. If criticism in French, one of the foremost languages of academic discourse, fails to be registered, then the chances of research written in lesser-known languages being picked up is negligible. The noticeable lack of engagement with other criticism (either written in another language or from a different viewpoint) raises the question whether some critics are not more often interested in promoting their own field of study rather than achieving a multi-faceted understanding of the object of study.
Chapter 5: Who is afraid of Dario Fo? Translation and adaptation strategies in English-language versions of Accidental Death of an Anarchist

Translations act as a form of intercultural communication, making what is alien to a culture come into contact with what is peculiar to it. [...] Since it is generally the receiving system that initiates the cultural contact, a translator’s decisions will be largely determined by the translation and cultural norms prevalent in the target polysystem.¹

Translation in general and theatre translation in particular has changed paradigms: it can no longer be assimilated to a mechanism of production of semantic equivalence copied mechanically from the source text. It is rather to be conceived of as an appropriation of one text by another. Translation theory thus follows the general trend of theatre semiotics, reorienting its objectives in the light of a theory of reception.²

In the last chapter, I dealt with a specific aspect of cross-cultural reception, academic criticism. The aim of this final chapter is to analyze yet another specific aspect of the reception process: the paratextual and metatextual commentary provided by several agents involved in the production of the English translations and adaptations of one of Dario Fo’s best known plays, Morte accidentale di un anarchico. Concentrating on the visible traces these agents leave within the covers of a book allows me to flesh out the translation and adaptation strategies pertaining to that particular case study, and to link these to the wider politics at work in the transposition of theatre texts and theatrical traditions.

Morte accidentale di un anarchico has been translated into many languages and staged in over fifty countries. The play is based on a true story: in 1969, a railway worker, Giuseppe Pinelli, was accused of being involved in the bombing of the Piazza Fontana in Milan. During the police questioning, Pinelli fell to his death from a window on the fourth floor, raising the question as to whether he jumped or was pushed. In the play, the central figure called 'Il Matto' – variously translated as 'the Maniac' or 'the Madman' – resorts to playing different roles (a high court judge, a police officer, a bishop) in order to show that the true culprits were the policemen interrogating the anarchist. Thus, Pinelli's case served Fo in his endeavour to attack the manner in which the Italian state reacted to what was perceived to be a real Communist threat: the so-called 'strategy of tension.' In no other West European country did the Communist Party count as many members as in Italy after 1945. Following international political events such as Kennedy's election in 1960, the Europe-wide political tensions of 1968 and domestic events such as the growing power of the unions, closely linked to the left-wing parties, the possibility that the Italian Communist Party might actually achieve power and force the Christian Democratic Party into opposition was perceived to be within reach. The Italian domestic and foreign secret services therefore decided to resort to a strategy of terrorism in order to prevent this from happening. In the three years from 1969 to 1972, Italy was shaken by several indiscriminate bomb attacks, which were blamed on left-wing terrorist groups but were actually carried out by right-wing terrorist groups and secret service agents. Counting on the fact that terror increases the population's desire for security at the expense of their desire for change, the Italian state decided to destabilize the country in order to stabilize it.3

Fo used his political theatre to present the Italian population with counter-information about the events that shaped those years. He pursued this endeavour in several other plays which, however, have not been as successful in English translation as Morte accidentale di un anarchico. Six different English translations or adaptations of this particular play were published in the twenty-five years between 1978 and 2003 (as many as of Pirandello's Six Characters in Search of an Author in about ninety years). There have also been various unpublished translations. In this chapter, I

---

3 For a brief overview of the 'strategy of tension' employed during the 1960s and 1970s in Italy, see Martin J. Bull and James Newell, Italian Politics: Adjustment under Duress (Cambridge and Malden, MA: Polity, 2005), 101-104. On strategies of counter-information such as the ones adopted by Dario Fo, see Aldo Giannuli, Bombe a inchiostro, (Milan, Italy: BUR Rizzoli, 2008).
engage with several questions: 1) Where does the need to attempt yet another English-language translation of Morte accidentale di un anarchico come from? 2) How present are the agents involved in the translation and adaptation process on a paratextual level? 3) What clues does this case study provide with regard to the cross-cultural transfer of theatrical texts and traditions?

Fo is known to encourage theatre directors and actors alike to adapt and change his texts as they see fit. He insists that the audience is in fact co-producer and actors are authors in their own right. The authenticity of the experience, he suggests, is more important than authenticity intended as faithfulness to the source text. In what way, then, has Fo’s permission to freely adapt his texts influenced the English-language versions of his play? As Jennifer Lorch points out, Fo is “quite relaxed about his relationship with his text but not so relaxed as to have no attachment to his work.” What I am interested in here is how Fo’s permission to freely adapt his texts has influenced the English-language translations and adaptations of Accidental Death of an Anarchist. As we have seen in chapter 1, there is no consensus on what exactly distinguishes a translation from an adaptation, which is usually defined quite broadly: “Adaptation may be understood as a set of translative interventions which result in a text that is not generally accepted as a translation but is nevertheless recognized as representing a source text.” In this chapter, I make do with the appellations the published texts are given: three are called translations, three are called adaptations. I use the umbrella term ‘version’ to subsume both translations and adaptations.

How, if at all, do the agents involved in the production of the various English-language versions engage with the freedom accorded to them? Deciding to publish a theatrical text automatically means giving the text a fixity that was never intended, as Stuart Hood points out: “What one must recognize is that by editing and printing the version of the text as it stands today one is fixing, as an entomologist fixes a butterfly or moth, a theatrical event which ought not to be subject to closure of this kind."

---

The many faces of Dario Fo

Dario Fo was born in 1926 in Sangiano on the shores of Lago Maggiore in Northern Italy. Having been called up to military service in 1944, he deserted and joined the Resistance. After the Second World War had ended, Fo studied architecture in Milan but was soon strongly attracted to the theatre world. His talent first emerged in radio sketches entitled Poer Nano (Poor Dwarf) in the early 1950s. In 1953, Fo’s review Il dito nell’occhio (A finger in the eye) was put on at the Piccolo Theatre in Milan. In 1954, Fo married Franca Rame who comes from a family with a long acting tradition. Rame became Fo’s most faithful collaborator, acting alongside him, editing his plays and other writings, and at all times critically engaging with, explaining and defending their theatrical practices. From the mid-1950s until the end of the 1960s, Fo and Rame put on their plays in established commercial theatres across Italy and were also invited to host the popular TV show Canzonissima, which combined music with sketches. However, the strict censorship of many of their sketches led Fo and Rame to abandon scripted television shows. They also became increasingly disillusioned with commercial theatre and decided, in 1968, to create a new theatre company on a cooperative basis, called Nuova Scena. The aim was to reach a different audience, that of the working class. Fo and Rame therefore started performing in factories, on public squares, in tents, in workers’ clubs and in the case del popolo, the Communist Party centres. In 1970, Fo and Rame finally broke with the Communist Party (they were never active members) and established another theatre initiative, La Comune. The premiere of Morte accidentale di un anarchico was staged in a warehouse in Via Capannone in Milan in December 1970. Between 1970 and 1981, Fo put on many political plays besides Morte accidentale, such as Pum Pum! Chi è? La polizia! (Knock Knock! Who’s There? Police!, 1972), Non si paga, non si paga! (We can't pay! We won't pay, 1974), Il Fanfani rapito (Fanfani abducted, 1975) and Clacson, trombette e pernacchie (Trumpets and Raspberries, 1981). Fo calls this type of theatre “un teatro da bruciare” (throw-away theatre). Yet it is his political theatre, with perhaps the exception of Mistero Buffo (1968), which has travelled across languages and cultures most successfully, despite being steeped in a particular situation pertinent to Italian political and social history. The 1980s and early 1990s saw several successful plays staged in Italy, amongst which notably Coppia aperta – quasi spalancata (The Open Couple, 1984) and Johan Padan a la descouverta de le Americhe (Johan Padan and the Discovery of the Americas, 1992), as well as some theoretical works on theatre practices. Fo also stage designed and directed operas, including Rossini’s works The Barber of Seville (1987) and The Italian Woman in Algiers (1994). In 1995, Fo suffered a stroke from which he recovered nearly completely; he returned to the stage and to writing soon afterwards. Fo seems to have been taken by surprise by the award of the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1997. The award also stunned many Italian intellectuals who did not see Fo as a primarily literary figure. Fo’s functions do indeed multiply: not only does he direct and star in the plays he writes, he also composes songs and works as a visual artist. Is he an actor who also writes or an author who also acts? Fo plays on this uncertainty in Fabulazzo: “Authors refuse to accept me as an author and actors refuse to accept me as an actor. Authors say I am an actor trying to be an author, while actors say I am an author trying to be an actor. Nobody wants me in their camp. Only the set designers tolerate me.” Translators and adaptors of Fo’s texts are confronted with a figure that often seems to be larger than life. Yet, as the Nobel Prize Committee stated:

---

7 Several intellectuals, including Umberto Eco and Giulio Ferroni, discussed the meaning of the awarding of the prize to somebody who was generally perceived to be a great actor but not necessarily a great author in a variety of newspapers, from Librarezione via La Stampa to La Repubblica. The most negative reaction came from the Vatican’s paper, L’Osservatore Romano, which wrote that “Fo is the sixth Nobel from Italy after Carducci, Deledda, Pirandello, Quasimodo, [and] Montale. After these sages, a clown.” Quoted in Ron Jenkins, Dario Fo and Franca Rame. Artful Laughter (New York: Aperture, 2001), 194.
One cannot hold it against Fo that he is a first-rate actor. The decisive thing is that he has written plays which arouse the enthusiasm of actors and which captivate his audiences. The texts are chiselled in an interplay with the spectators and have often been given their final shape over a long time. Rapidly changing situations give impetus to the plays and shape the characters. The rhythm of the actors' lines, the witty wording and the aptitude for improvisation combine with strong intensity and artistic energy in the profoundly meaningful, steady flow of his flashes of wit. The printed texts can also give you this feeling if you give free range to your imagination. Fo's work brings to the fore the multifarious abundance of the literary field.

Fo has continued to write plays in the last fifteen years since the Nobel Prize, bringing his total theatrical œuvre to over seventy plays. Two plays have been particularly successful with the audience and critics alike: L'anomalo bicefalo (The Two-Headed Anomaly, 2003), a scornful satire of then prime minister Silvio Berlusconi and Lu santo jullàre Francesco (The Holy Jester Francis, 1999) in which Fo presents his interpretation of Saint Francis as a representative of the giullare tradition.

The most central figure in Fo's theatre is a re-elaboration of the medieval Italian fool figure called giullare. The term is often misleadingly translated into English as jester, yet a jester is first and foremost connected to the court and aristocracy. The Italian giullare, however, is a travelling solo performer who entertains the people on public squares, in the street and on market places. Not only the bearer of news, he also publicly criticizes the social injustice he sees around him and, in his role of a fool and an outsider, usually gets away with speaking the truth. Fo uses the device of the fool speaking the truth both in Mistero buffo, his first and most famous giullarata, and in Morte accidentale di un anarchico. The Maniac/Madman is a modern giullare and thus protected by a medical certificate which attests his insanity:

---

10 For a detailed account of Fo's lifelong engagement with the carnival tradition and the figure of the fool, see Antonio Scuderi, Dario Fo: Framing, Festival, and the Folkloric Imagination (Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books, 2011).
thus, he is the only one who has got a jester’s licence and therefore the only one who can get at the truth without being seriously harmed.

In its presentation speech, the Nobel Prize Committee highlights exactly these two pieces of writing (Mistero Buffo and Accidental Death) centred around the figure of the giullare. Sture Allén said the following about Accidental Death:

The play is about the cross-examining following on the supposed accident. By and by the questioning is taken over, through a brilliantly carried out shift, by a Hamlet-like figure - il Matto - who has the kind of madness that exposes official falsehoods. All in all there are many topical allusions in Fo’s plays, but the texts transcend everyday situations and are given a far wider range of application. (“Presentation by Sturé Allen,” 18)

Despite referring to a specific event in Italian history and despite being an example of Fo’s ‘throwaway theatre,’ Accidental Death of an Anarchist struck a chord with many theatre-makers in Europe and elsewhere. Translators and theatre-makers all over the world were attracted to the play for various reasons: the political character of the play, the brilliant protagonist that is the ‘Matto’ figure or Fo’s distinct brand of humour that merges popular forms of farce with the political and social concerns of modern life. Amongst the first European countries to stage Accidental Death were Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Germany and Austria, countries that had quite a strong tradition of staging a certain kind of political theatre (associated with authors such as Brecht and Mayakovsky). In the English-speaking world, the term ‘political theatre’ has quite different connotations, which, as we shall see, in turn influenced the reading(s) of Fo’s work. The transposing of the play into the British or American context poses particular problems which will be at the centre of my investigation.

11 The Fiol Teater in Copenhagen was the first to stage a translated version of the play in the 1972/73 season, followed by Trondelag Teater (Trondheim, Norway) in 1975/76. Towards the end of the 1970s, more countries follow: Sweden (Narren Teatern in Stockholm, 1978/79), Germany (several theatres) and Austria (with nearly 490 shows over two seasons from 1978 to 1980 at the Ensemble Theater in Vienna). The first staging in France happened in 1979. For a preliminary list of foreign stagings of Accidental Death and other plays, see http://www.archivio.francarame.it/estero.asp. Last accessed on 3 September 2012.

Issues of translation

Perhaps one of the most difficult facts about Dario Fo to transmit to a non-Italian audience is that he is revolutionary and radical where politics are concerned, yet “an intransigent conservative in poetics,” that is to say, deeply steeped in the tradition of Italian popular theatre.\(^\text{12}\) Also, as we have seen, Fo is not simply a playwright and an actor: “Continuing the Italian tradition of an actor-dominated theatre, in which actors applied themselves to all aspects of their trade, he directs, designs sets and costumes, and choreographs his own productions” (Scuderi, Framing, Festival, and the Folkloric Imagination, 1). Fo’s theatre is didactic without being cathartic: it should make the audience reflect on serious political and societal issues while being entertaining at the same time.\(^\text{13}\) This poses a problem for translators and adaptors who find themselves struggling with the task of merging Fo’s particular brand of humour that refers back to a typically Italian tradition of popular theatre with the political fervour of the plot. As so many of Fo’s other plays, Morte accidentale di un anarchico refers to a specific historical event that requires a considerable amount of background knowledge. Should translators and adaptors attempt to communicate this context to a non-Italian audience or reading public and if yes, how to do so without overburdening them?

What further complicates the issue is the way in which the written versions of Fo’s texts are achieved. There is no such thing as a single source text, a scripted play that a translator could refer back to. Fo starts off with a rough copy of a play which he constantly changes during rehearsals. In the case of Morte Accidentale, Fo was still changing lines and scenes while on tour from 1970 to 1972 to keep up with developments in the trial of \(^{13}\) Fo’s theatre is didactic not in its pejorative sense of pedantry but it is a theatre that sees its function as that of counter-information that stimulates thought processes in the audience. Fo does not want to create a liberating emotional release in his audience; he wants his audience to leave the theatre with anger still inside them which can be carried forward into their socio-political struggle: “Noi non vogliamo liberare nella indignazione - lo diciamo alla fine - la gente che viene. Noi vogliamo che la rabbia stia dentro, resti dentro e non si liberi, che diventi operante, che faccia diventare razionante il momento in cui ci troviamo, e portarlo nella lotta.” Dario Fo, Compagni Senza Censura, vol. 2 (Milan: Collettivo Teatrale La Comune, 1973), 189.

policemen involved in the Pinelli affair happening right then. After each performance, Fo discusses the play with his audience in what he calls 'third acts.' Along with the introductory monologue that he provides before the play (lasting about fifteen to twenty minutes), these third acts are important features of a Fo performance that never make it into the written versions of his texts in their entirety. Fo often rewrites parts of his playtexts in order to engage with the audience's reaction. Also, he is not interested in the theatrical text as a primarily written document: “Fo's scripts are not elaborate literary or verbal constructs but texts at the service of performance” (Farrell and Scuderi, “Poetics of Dario Fo,” 13). The existing published Italian versions of Morte Accidentale have been collated from a variety of sources; and the Italian text acknowledges Fo's wife, Franca Rame, as the editor of the play. Not surprisingly, in a familiar move which aims to assign a 'unique voice' to literary works, not one of the English translations mentions Rame's involvement, and this despite the immense influence she has had and still has on all of Fo's work.

Her influence in the shaping and modifying of their theatre had always been considerable and [...] received more generous notice on the covers of the printed version. It could be said that if the plays began as his, they ended as hers. [...] She intervenes substantially from the beginning of rehearsals. It is also she who administers the companies and prepares the changing versions of the script into something that could be distributed to the company and later delivered for publication. (Farrell and Scuderi, “Poetics of Dario Fo,” 7)

The three Italian editions present the reader with two different versions of Fo's drama. The first resorts to a framing device, setting the 14 In theatrical circles, a playtext refers to the finished blueprint of the final presentation. I consciously use this term to point towards the draft-like nature of Fo's 'originals' with which translators and adaptors work as well as towards the fact that most English translations of the play are based on playtexts used in actual productions rather than drama texts.

---

story in 1921 in New York, where another anarchist, Andrea Salsedo, fell out of a window during police questioning. This framing device is dropped in the second version. The main difference between the two texts is the ending. The first ends with an explosion and prolonged screaming which the audience witnesses in complete darkness. Shortly afterwards, the actor playing the ‘Matto’ reappears on stage as the true judge come to conduct the enquiry (this is the ending used in the latest 2004 and 2007 Einaudi editions). The second text ends with a socialist critique of society, namely with the words: “Siamo nello sterco fino al collo, è vero, ed è proprio per questo che camminiamo a testa alta.”

Yet another matter to consider is the practice of translating plays for the theatre. In the Western tradition, there are two dominant ways of translating for the theatre: there is a stage-oriented tradition which concerns itself with a specific staging at a particular time in history aimed at a specific audience and there is a reader-oriented tradition, mainly concerned with philological exactness and literary values. The first tradition produces performance or theatre texts while the second tradition produces so-called drama texts. A drama text is supposed to be mainly read (the German term Buchdrama is telling in this regard) while a theatre text is supposed to be mainly performed. Most of the published English versions of Fo’s play are 15 “It's true - we're in the shit up to our necks, and that's precisely the reason why we walk with our heads held high.” Translation by Ed Emery in Fo, Plays: 1, ed. Stuart Hood, trans. Ed Emery, et al., Methuen Drama (London: Methuen, 2006), 206.

---

16 See Manuela Perteghella, “A Descriptive-Anthropological Model of Theatre Translation,” in Drama Translation and Theatre Practice, ed. Sabine Coelsch-FOIsner and Holger Klein (Berne: Peter Lang, 2004), 1-23. On the two traditions, see 6. On non-Western translation traditions, see Eva Hung and Judy Wakabayashi, ed., Asian Translation Traditions. Manchester: St. Jerome Publishing, 2005. Farrell points out that Fo himself draws a distinction between ‘theatre’ and ‘dramatic literature’: "He consigned Pier Paolo Pasolini to the domain of 'dramatic literature' on the grounds that he had no feeling for the rhythms of theatre, no sense of dramatic tension, no understanding of the primacy of the actor, no grasp of the demands of immediate communication with an audience in real time. If all theatrical texts occupy an indeterminate, intermediate space between literature and performance, not all lie on the same meridian between those two poles. Fo's preference is for those plays that incline towards performance and away from literature, as his own do. Put differently, Fo's scripts have much in common with the canovaccio of commedia dell'arte: they are, of course, more than outline plots intended as a prompt for improvisation, but they are less than the finished, polished scripts produced by such other Nobel Prize-winning dramatists as Bernard Shaw or Eugene O'Neill." Joseph Farrell, “Variations on a Theme: Respecting Dario Fo,” Modern Drama 41, no. 1 (1998): 19-29. Here 22.
theatre texts based on the final blueprints of the production (playtexts), only one is a drama text (not written with a specific staging in mind).

How is a theatre text achieved in the English-speaking world? A theatre company commissions what they call a ‘literal’ translation from a translator (who does not necessarily get a mention in the programme or, indeed, decent remuneration for his or her efforts). Then the company hires an adaptor, sometimes this is the director, sometimes the principal actor, sometimes it is a collaboration. This adaptor then changes the text in order to make it more audience-oriented; he or she makes the text work for the particular show that is being set up. In the case of Fo, some adaptors do not speak Italian and are therefore unable to check the translated text they are given against the source text or to refer back to the source text at all. The practice of commissioning translations done by a famous, usually monolingual playwright is accepted in the UK but it is frowned upon in other countries, such as France. Lately, the situation in the UK seems to be changing as well: the international project ‘Channels,’ initiated by the National Theatre Studio in London, sponsors the collaboration of author, translator and adaptor. The English version of Habitats, staged by the Gate Theatre in 2002, for example, was written during a residency sponsored by ‘Channels’ that allowed the French playwright Philippe Minyana, the translator Christopher Campbell and the translator-playwright Steve Waters to collaborate on the project. Here, as in more traditional practices of adaptation that do not involve an input from the author of the source text, the assumption seems to be that a literary translator working on the literal translation does not know enough about theatre practices to make the text work as a theatre text in the first place.

In the case of Morte accidentale di un anarchico in English translation, we have a proliferation of agents involved, starting with the author, Dario Fo, who constantly changes his texts and his wife, Franca Rame, who collates all the different existing versions into another, publishable, version that is printed as the ‘original’ Italian drama text. This text is then translated 'literally' into English by an (often unnamed) translator; this literal translation is subsequently adapted by one or more people into a theatre text. If the play is successful enough, the theatre text is then fixed again in a published version. The UK theatre publisher Methuen has published four out of the six available printed versions of Fo's play in English. Their interest in the playwright and their policy of translation have fundamentally shaped the reception of Fo's works in the British literary and theatrical polysystems.¹⁸

---

Before I move on to the editing voices in the various translations' paratextual corpus, that is to say the voices we hear in the prefaces, introductions, footnotes, and commentary of a metatextual nature strewn here and there in the playtexts proper, let us have a closer look at the translation history of Morte accidentale di un anarchico into English.

Translating and adapting Morte accidentale di un anarchico into English

There are six published translations of the text available in English, four of which published in the Methuen Modern Drama series and two published in the United States. In chronological order, these are:

- Gavin Richards’s 1979 adaptation based on Gillian Hanna’s literal translation, first published by Pluto Press and then by Methuen;
- Susan Cowan’s translation for Theater Magazine in 1979;
- Richard Nelson’s 1983 adaptation of Cowan’s translation, published by Samuel French Inc.;
- Alan Cumming and Tim Supple’s 1991 adaptation for the National Theatre, published by Methuen;
- Ed Emery’s translation (not written with an immediate staging in mind), published in a 1992 Methuen collection of plays by Dario Fo; and

¹⁸ "An example of a culture where the contemporary theatrical system exercises some influence over the publication of drama is provided by contemporary England, where the most important publisher of drama, Methuen, prefers 'stage' to 'page' translations, that is, translations where the focus is on the expectations of the receiving stage rather than on the careful repetition of the details of the source text." Sirkku Aaltonen, Time-Sharing on Stage: Drama Translation in Theatre and Society (Clevedon, England and Buffalo, NY: Multilingual Matters, 2000), 39.

In the following sections, I will focus on the paratextual corpus and on comments of a metatextual nature in five out of the six versions, leaving aside Suzanne Cowan’s translation for Theater Magazine, as it is not in book form and does not include any paratext. I am also not including any versions that did not result in a published text, such as Robyn Archer's adaptation of the 1991 UK text for an Australian audience or the translation used by Luca Giberti for his 2005 staging at the Oxford Playhouse.¹⁹

The published versions of any Fo translations and adaptations need to satisfy a variety of 'clients' who read the text with different sets of expectations. The play has made it onto a variety of syllabuses in quite diverse college courses: Italian studies, theatre studies, world literature, comparative literature or cultural studies. In the autumn of 2010, for example, NYU in Florence offered a course entitled “Italy since 1815” which features Fo's Accidental Death of an Anarchist (no particular translation/adaptation specified) alongside Paul Ginsborg's history of Italy and his book on Silvia Berlusconi, Tomasi di Lampedusa's The Leopard, a biography of Mussolini and Vittorio de Sica's 1948 film The Bicycle Thief.²⁰ Reading Fo’s text in this context is clearly different from reading it with a view of a possible staging or an analysis for a paper on theatrical practices. In what versions, if at all, does the paratextual corpus take into consideration the diversity of the readership?

There seems to be a general consensus amongst British theatre makers that there are particular obstacles to be overcome in a theatre production based on translation, especially translations coming from 'the South.' Stefania Taviano argues that these perceived obstacles (high emotionality, stronger folk tradition, more diversified local customs and dialects) are not so much innate to Italian theatre, but rather exaggerated by a general British attitude towards the Mediterranean, in particular Italy: the British are drawn towards the 'cradle of civilisation' but at the same time tend to establish their cultural superiority over the chaotic Mediterraneans. There are two ways of dealing with these obstacles, and both are visible in the translation choices adopted towards Morte accidentale: either one adheres to a stereotypical image of Italian culture, thus reducing characters to caricatures or one transfers the plot to a British milieu, the assumption being that domestication is what the audience wants (or the only thing the audience can cope with). However, this domestication results in heavily adapted translations. Perhaps as a reaction to this practice of heavy adaptations, in a reversal, "critical discourse surrounding British productions of Italian theatre continues to be characterized by a normative approach built around concepts such as faithfulness, authenticity and truthfulness to the original" (Taviano, "British Acculturation of Italian Theatre," 340). This critical discourse often happens on the paratextual and metatextual levels surrounding a printed playtext, which therefore merit closer analysis.

---

Gavin Richards

Gavin Richards's adaptation of Gillian Hanna's translation was commissioned by Belt & Braces Roadshow Company in 1978. In January 1979, the premiere at Dartington College saw Fred Molina in the role of the Maniac. After initial success, the production moved to London, first to the Half Moon Theatre, then to Wyndhams Theatre where Richards took over the main role as well as continuing his position as director. Pluto Press first published the English playtext in 1980; a corrected edition appeared as part of the Methuen 'Modern Drama' series in 1987. The 1987 text was republished in 2001. On the upper right corner on the cover of this latest edition, we find a timeline from the 1930s to 2000. The 1970s are marked by a bold outside border, thus helping the unknowing reader to place the text in time.

---

22 For a few example of posters that portray Italians in a stereotypical way, see appendix 3.

The paratext in the Methuen edition is considerable: we have got an eight page introduction by Stuart Hood, a five page contribution by Dario Fo exclusively written for the 1980 English text and a five page postscript by Dario Fo (this is Ed Emery’s translation of the postscript of the Italian 1974 text). Except for three footnotes by Emery in the postscript, there are no footnotes to explain specific cultural references. On a paratextual level, the reader is only confronted with two voices, that of Hood and that of Fo. We do not hear directly from the 'literal' translator Hanna or the adaptor Richards. Thus there is no explanation provided for some of Richards's (some would say debatable) decisions: from where arose the need to add and cut scenes? Why the abundance of stage directions, not to be found in the Italian play? Why name the character of the commissario sportivo Pissani? Do these choices really contribute to the 'performability' of the play?23 While Richards's voice is not visible in the paratext, it becomes audible in several metatextual comments strewn into the playtext which I will analyze shortly.

The postscript is a translation of the preface to the Italian 1974 version of the play. It concentrates on the context that led to the Italian production of Accidental Death of an Anarchist and describes the changes to the text during Fo and Rame's two year tour of Italy.24 In the postscript, Fo states that adaptations are always necessary. While on tour with the play, "the spiral of the [Italian government's - M.D.] strategy of tension has increased, and has created other victims: the play has been brought up to 23 Susan Bassnett points out that 'performability' is a concept that is often used "to excuse the practice of handing over a supposedly literal translation to a monolingual playwright, and [...] to justify substantial variations in the target language text, including cuts and additions." Susan Bassnett, "Translating for the Theatre: The Case against Performability," TTR (Traduction, Terminologie, Redaction) 4, no. 1 (1991): 99-111. Here 102.

24 As this text was written with an Italian audience in mind, Emery adds three footnotes to explain to English-language readers who Inspector Calabresi is (the real life commissario sportivo) and who Feltrinelli is (an Italian publisher who was killed under mysterious circumstances) as well as the location of La Comune's theatre at the time.
date, and its message has been made more explicit. Adaptors therefore, Fo advocates, are free to change the playtext as long as their aim is to make the message more explicit and the didactic function of theatre more effective. This is a crucial point.

In the introduction (written in 1986), Stuart Hood provides a short biography of Fo and an overview of his and Rame’s theatrical practices. He accords Accidental Death half a page, thus focusing mainly on positioning this play within Fo’s larger œuvre. Hood’s personal view of Fo’s importance as a political playwright emerges in the final paragraph:

Dario Fo and Franca Rame have a world-wide reputation. The Scandinavian countries were among the first to welcome them as performers and to produce their work. The whole of Western Europe has by now acknowledged their importance and virtuosity. Ironically the Berliner Ensemble, the theatre founded by Brecht to whom Fo owes so much, found Fo’s rock version of The Beggar’s Opera too difficult to take in spite of Brecht’s advice to treat famous authors with disrespect if you have the least consideration for the ideas they express.

Hood’s self-effacement in the introduction leaves room for a more critical voice, Dario Fo’s own, in the ‘Author’s Note.’ The note serves several purposes. First, Fo defines his play as a “farce of power.” Second, the note justifies the need for three different Italian editions published within a short time frame. Finally, in the note Fo points out the difference between the Italian and English audiences:

The English public, seeing this play in its present adaptation, obviously cannot feel the real, tragic, tangible atmosphere which the Italian public brought with them when they came to the performance. It can share this only by the act of imagination or – better still – by substituting for the violence practised by the powers in Italy (the police, the judiciary, the economy of the banks and the multinationals) equally tragic and brutal facts from the recent history in England. (Fo, Accidental Death [Richards], xvi-xvii)

---

Fo clearly advocates the translators and adaptors’ freedom and has himself freely adapted Brecht’s work. Yet, he is critical of Richards’s adaptation for quite specific reasons:

I have the impression — more than an impression — that some passages which have been skipped in Gavin Richards’s version may have produced some erosion at a satirical level, that is to say in the relationship of the tragic to the grotesque, which was the foundation of the original work, in favour of solutions which are exclusively comic. (xvi-xvii)\(^{27}\)

Satire is part of Fo’s didactic theatre; simple slapstick comedy is not. Fo is not alone in this judgment; several theatre and literary scholars with knowledge of Italian agree that by opting for entertainment the Richards version has left the defining didactic and satirical elements in Fo’s theatre out of the equation.\(^ {28}\)

Tellingly, Fo ends his “Author’s Note” with a popular Sicilian song from the nineteenth century in which a madman laughing at a king escapes punishment because the people know “it is great bad luck to kill a madman protected as they are by the pity of St Francis ‘the great madman of God.’ ” Fo introduces the song with the following words: “We [in Italy – M. D.] are \(^{27}\) Actually, Fo had to be restrained when he saw Richards’s production in London for the first time. Although he hardly speaks English, he could see that the didactic qualities of his theatre had been neglected in favour of slapstick comedy and stereotypical representation of Italians. Farrell notes that “[s]everal people tried to explain to him the differences between British and Italian traditions of comic writing and performance, attempting to placate him — for he needed placating — by talking of the vibrancy of a music hall tradition which had provided the inspiration of the British production” before asking: “Was Fo, of all authors, entitled to his annoyance?” See Farrell, “Variations,” 24.

\(^{28}\) As early as in 1986, Tony Mitchell argues that “Richards’s adaptation and the style of his direction of the piece […] severely distorted the meaning and intention of the original, cutting it extensively and adding speeches and stage business which often went completely against the grain of Fo’s play.” Tony Mitchell, Dario Fo. People’s Court Jester (London: Methuen Theatrefiles, 1986), 98-99. Similarly, Stefania Taviano argues that “Fo’s revolutionary theatre is reduced to theatre with a political content […] Taken out of its Italian context, the political content of Fo’s theatre can be maintained, while its function and efficacy tend to be altered. Thus the theatrical quality of Fo’s plays is given priority over its political role.” Stefania Taviano, “Translating Political Theatre: The Case of Dario Fo and Franca Rame,” in Drama Translation and Theatre Practice, ed. Sabine Coelsch-Foisner and Holger Klein (Berne: Peter Lang, 2004), 325-40. Here 328-9. In her 2007 comparative article on the comic voice in the original Italian and Richards’s version, Brigid Maher also argues that the changes made by the adaptor result in a change of the protagonist’s character. As a result, the play’s brand of humour and its message are altered. Brigid Maher, “The Comic Voice in Translation: Dario Fo’s Accidental Death of an Anarchist, Journal of Intercultural Studies 24, no. 8 (2007): 367-79.
not yet a sufficiently modern nation to have forgotten the ancient feeling for satire. That is why we can still laugh, with a degree of cynicism, at the macabre dance which power and the civilisation that goes with it performs daily, without waiting for carnival” (Fo, “Author’s Note” [Richards], xviii). Fo suggests that, historically, the popular understanding of social hierarchies and the handling of satire in Italy are radically different to those in other European countries. The link between the Maniac and the marginalized figure of the giullare, “a fool, with that special brand of madness that allows him to speak the truth and criticize others, even his betters” is deliberate (Scuderi, Dario Fo: Framing, Festival, 6). To summarize, the “Author’s Note” defines the play in terms of genre (political farce) that belongs to both the specific tradition of Italian satire and to a more universal tradition of carnival figures who possess jester’s licence. Fo charges the Richards version with being less effective both didactically and satirically than its Italian original. Yet, he is willing to accept that this might not be exclusively the adaptor’s fault but due to fundamental differences in theatre practices and political cultures.

The paratextual apparatus aims to provide readers with as much contextual information as possible about the author, authorial intention and the history of the play itself. It is quite strange then to see that the playtext proper in the Richards version not only provides very little context but also sometimes sharply contradicts the aims expressed in the paratext. In my view, there are two metatextual moments in particular that reveal a certain degree of uneasiness on the part of the adaptor regarding the freedom accorded by Fo.

Right at the start of the play, in an added scene, Inspector Bertozzo introduces himself to the audience as “Francesco Giovanni Batista Giancarlo Bertozzo of the Security Police” and informs them that he has been struggling to do his daily work because of the public outrage following a “sordid little incident a few weeks ago when an anarchist, under interrogation in a similar room a few floors above, fell through the window” (Fo, Accidental Death [Richards], 1). Then, before he starts questioning the Maniac (which is how the Italian play starts) he directs these words at the audience: “I ought to warn you that the author of this sick little play, Dario Fo, has the traditional, irrational hatred of the police common to all narrow-minded left-wingers and so I shall, no doubt, be the unwilling butt of endless anti-authoritarian jibes" (2). Belt & Braces were known in the UK as a left-wing theatre. Ideally, the audience would interpret the first dig at Fo as tongue-in-cheek or as irony in line with Fo’s permission to freely adapt his texts. Yet, the words “sick little play” and “traditional, irrational hatred” may also be understood as markers of distance: are the adaptor and actors perhaps distancing themselves from some of the political messages contained in the play? Ultimately, Richards seems to be undermining the didactic function of Fo’s theatre for a single laugh from his audience. In my view, this first scene twists another of Fo’s intentions, that of portraying the Italian police as he perceived it to be: violent, unpredictable, and corrupt. The first few scenes of the play in Italian are ambiguous: it is not yet clear who will triumph over whom, who will be the butt of the joke in the end. Richards does not leave any doubt about who is going to be ridiculed all along. This is unfortunate because, as Tony Mitchell points out:

> It is important to stress that the police characters [...] are no mere caricatures or stereotypes – a factor which makes many foreign productions of the play inaccurate. Although Fo makes them the butts of comedy and farce, this is inherent in the inconsistencies of their statements and behaviours, which is in fact that of devious, dangerous types who show the abuses of power the police exerted in brazenly cracking down on the Italian left, frequently without a shred of evidence, often resorting to wildly trumped-up accusations. (Mitchell, People’s Jester, 62)

By presenting the audience with the ‘right’ interpretation of the role assigned to the policemen in the play, Richards flattens out some of the deliberate ambiguity.

Towards the end of the play, there is a further metatextual moment: the Maniac uses as examples Anthony Blunt and Guy Burgess, clearly English references, at which point the ‘Superintendent’ addresses the actor who is playing the Maniac by name saying: “This isn’t Dario Fo.” The Maniac replies that he knows but that he does not care. There follows a heated exchange:
Pissani: This is an unheard of distortion of the author's meaning!
Maniac: He'll get his royalties. Who's moaning?
Pissani: Get back to the script!
Superintendent: This is an insult to Dario Fo!
Feletti: Good. I've got a bone to pick with him. Why is there only one woman's part in his blasted play? I feel marooned!
Maniac: The author's sexist?
Feletti: He's pre-historic!
Bertozzo: Then why are we bothering?
Maniac: He's a pre-historic genius! On with the dance! (Fo, Accidental Death [Richards], 68)

Though reminiscent of techniques such as Brecht's Verfremdungseffekt and consistent with Fo's anti-illusionistic tendencies, the contrived departure from the script seems to me to actually undermine the didactic function of Fo's theatre. If the gag had stopped at "This isn't Dario Fo" it might have served its purpose better: reminding the audience that this is an Italian play in translation and that therefore it is not an exact equivalent, that this is not one hundred percent Dario Fo. Even more interestingly perhaps, this metatextual moment expresses Richards's struggle to find a balance between the freedom granted to him by the author who will "get his royalties" anyhow and the restrictions imposed by cultural conventions regarding the nature of translation. These conventions tend to demand a return to an authorized or original script.

What is the most important aspect of Fo's theatre that Richards wanted to transpose in his adaptation? As Richards's voice is not present on a paratextual level, let me quote briefly from an interview:

> The most important point about the play is that it is what popular theatre is about, not only in Italy but also in this country. What we haven't really succeeded in doing is adapting a popular form successfully for a larger audience without writing something which either condescends to sexism or racism, or which falls back on easy jokes, the extremely vicious anti-people edges of humour. Fo is an important lesson for us (in left-wing political theatre) because, effortlessly, he destroys the invisible fourth wall and creates live theatre again.29

---

In an effort to transplant Fo’s live and popular theatre to British soil, Richards ends up falling back on what he criticizes in popular British theatre: sexism, racism (stereotyping Italians must qualify as such), easy jokes and the recurrence to vulgar language (Fo rarely uses cuss words; most English translations and adaptations use them abundantly). Belt & Braces provided information about the Italian context and the political message of the original in the programme where they also referred to similar cases of injustice in the British system (see appendix IV). However, with this information relegated to the epitext (the programme in the event of a staging) and the paratext (in the published version), the English playtext proper no longer fulfils the function that Morte accidentale di un anarchico had fulfilled in Italy: its satire is less effective, the message is less radical and, overall, the play is less didactic. It is a different kind of funny, as well. No matter how persuasively the paratextual commentary tries to argue for equivalence, translations and adaptations are not about equivalence. Every translation clearly has to move away from the original and create another text in its own right that still works in the receiving culture.

The Richards adaptation was highly successful – it defined how Fo would be seen in the UK for a very long time. If one only reads the playtext without any of the commentaries in the paratext or any other knowledge of Fo’s theatre, the text in itself works. Yet, as we have seen, there are discrepancies between the message of the play proper and the message given to us in the paratext. When publishing an adaptation, perhaps greater care should be taken to bring the text and paratext more in line with one another. The published text would be more coherent if Richards had explained his adaptation strategies in a paratextual contribution or if certain discrepancies between the Italian texts and the translation had been explained in footnotes.

Richard Nelson

The first and only version of Accidental Death to have appeared in a North American publishing house (Samuel French, Inc.) in 1987 contains a limited paratextual corpus, none of which can be assigned to a single identifiable individu. The first page provides biographical and bibliographical information about both Fo and Nelson. Another two pages are dedicated to copyright acknowledgements and ‘Important Billing & Credit Requirements’ which are very detailed, specifying the size of type and prominence of credit to be accorded in the event of a restaging to the playwright, adaptor and theatre that first staged the version in the United States. A further two pages reproduce the programme and cast list of the Broadway show. The final two pages of paratext preceding the playtext proper consist of a note on the text and a brief prologue which mentions the Pinelli and Salsedo cases. Uneasiness about the involvement of a variety of agents and the ensuing proliferation of voices is palpable in the note, which deserves to be quoted at length:

The version printed in this volume was first created by Richard Nelson in 1983 for a production at Arena Stage. His adaptation was based on Suzanne Cowan’s literal translation, published in Theater Magazine in 1979. For the Arena Stage production and the subsequent Broadway production, both directed by Douglas Wager, Nelson revised the dialogue for the American stage, and added some references to current politics. Dario Fo approved his adaptation. Subsequently, Fo asked for further changes in the text, which were made by Ron Jenkins and Joel Schechter, in collaboration with Fo and Franca Rame. His changes included some new political references, and dialogue closer in meaning to that of the original Italian text. These changes were made with the consent of Richard Nelson, who remains credited as the American adaptor of the play. Future productions of the text may require further alteration of political references, unless our President is elected for a life term, and outlives the century.\(^\text{30}\)

Conscious of Fo’s negative reaction to Richards’s version, the American team of adaptors tried very hard to respect authorial intent, asking for Fo’s advice and enrolling major theatre experts such as Schechter. The issue of authoritativeness is of utmost importance: while everyone involved in the shaping of the text is mentioned (even the literal translator!), special attention is drawn to the fact that all changes were made in agreement with the author and adaptor.

The play was successful in San Francisco and in Washington D.C., but on Broadway it closed after twenty performances and fifteen previews. Fo’s involvement in the ‘politicization’ of the play may have resulted in a version closer to the Italian, but it failed to inspire audiences. Taviano has suggested that this may be due to a very specifically American understanding of ‘political’ and ‘political theatre.’ Political theatre in the United States is perceived to be broadly equivalent to propagandistic and didactic theatre, starting with the Federal Theatre Project (FTP) under Roosevelt’s New Deal. Founded in 1935, the FTP served a double aim: to provide work for unemployed actors and to draw in people who would not usually go to the theatre. In a new dramatic form, the “Living Newspaper,” this kind of political theatre focused on social issues (such as housing, health care and labour unions). Several other political theatre groups emerged over the decades (such as Group Theatre, Moscow Art Theatre, Living Theater, the Performance Group) which were also perceived to be “both agit-prop and [...] dealing with social and identity issues.” In the United States, therefore, political has come to mean anything which is not highly commercial, which does not correspond to Broadway’s standards and is not staged in mainstream theatres. The definition of political theatre functions as a handy label, a category to identify theatre texts that are disturbing, challenging and therefore difficult to stage.31

Based on these criteria, the categorization of Fo’s play as ‘political’ perhaps made its failure on Broadway in the 1980s inevitable. Other stagings, in smaller, non-mainstream theatres, have been relatively profitable. Only recently, in the summer of 2011, a version of the play closely based on Emery’s 2003 translation was successfully staged in New Jersey.32

31 See Stefania Taviano, Staging Dario Fo and Franca Rame. Anglo-American approaches to Political Theatre (Aldershot and Burlington: Ashgate, 2005), 66-69. Here 69.
Alan Cumming and Tim Supple

In 1990, Alan Cumming and Tim Supple wrote another adaptation of Fo's play for the National Theatre, which toured the UK before moving to London in January 1991. The adaptation, published in 1991, was advertised both in the jacket text and on the first page as a "fresh new version, faithful to the clear-sighted insanity of the original." In terms of language and political intent, this version is closer to the Italian published texts than the Richards or Nelson versions. Yet, this adaptation was received less well than its predecessor. By then, the Richards version had made its way onto syllabuses at UK universities, thereby attaining the status of an 'original' in its own right, both for audiences and (many) critics. Cumming and Supple stress that their version is different in many ways from Richards's: in a similar move to Nelson, they invited Fo during the rehearsals and got "a few gags" from him. No literal translator is mentioned in this version, and despite the reference to the original, the adaptors do not reveal what Italian editions they worked with (or if they worked with Italian texts at all). Cumming and Supple clearly also worked with Richards's and Nelson's versions: they too decide to name the commissario sportivo of the Italian version: however, the inspector loses a letter in his name and is no longer called Pissani but Pisani, most probably in an effort to make his name less of a laughing matter for an English-speaking audience.

By 1991, Stuart Hood, the author of the introduction to the 1987 Methuen text, had become series editor of the Methuen Modern Drama series. As such, he was in a position to decide what sort of paratext would be published alongside the new adaptation. Unlike the Richards adaptation, the 1991 text contains neither an author's note nor a translation of any of the available Italian prefaces, introductions or postscripts by Fo. Instead, the paratext consists of two introductions, one by Hood himself, one by Christopher Cairns, another literary scholar, a short "Note on the Present Text" by the adaptors, as well as two texts that follow the playtext: the lyrics.

32 Andrew Burnett, "Rebirth of an Anarchist", List, 26 October 1990.
to the song used at the end of Act 1 and a list of changes made while on tour. While we had heard twice from Fo in the 1987 version and not at all from the adaptor, here the adaptors get to say their share but Fo is only ever quoted.

Hood's introduction is exactly the same as the one in the Richards version of 1986 with no further additions to comment on developments in Fo's life or œuvre between 1986 and 1991. In his contribution, Cairns expands on the historical facts of the Pinelli case and also explains Fo's credo that "everything must be done through irony" and that it is the ironic role reversal, which he calls a "rising crescendo from the realistic through the implausible to the grotesque" that makes Accidental Death special. Cairns quotes Fo's criticism of directors who choose the easy way of entertainment while leaving aside the political message expressed in his Dialogo provocatorio sul comico, il tragico, la follia e la ragione:

This game of grotesques, of paradox, of madness, is a device quite capable of standing on its own without the political message. So much so that some directors (heaven forgive them) concerned to create pure entertainment, have taken out of the play all the real conflict, they have built up the comedy to the point of making it into an exchange between clowns, arriving, in the end, at a kind of surreal pochade, where everyone splits their sides laughing, and goes out of the theatre quite empty of political anger or indignation." (Cairns, "Introduction," xix)

The British audience might now better understand Fo's point, Cairns continues, with the handling of the judicial cases of the Guildford Four and the Birmingham Six, for example. Cumming and Supple themselves add a note, a short page and a half, which starts off with the following statement:

From the outset we knew that a revival of Accidental Death of an Anarchist must grow directly from Fo's original text. Even in literal translation, we were aware of an uncomplicated satire [...] that we had not recognised in other English adaptations. We understood how, as Fo put it, tragedy had been turned into farce: the farce of power.\textsuperscript{35}

Having learned from Richards's and Nelson's shortcomings, Cumming and Supple claim that their characters are never caricatures but reveal themselves through action and situation. While they clearly wanted the audience to laugh, they never lost sight "of the target, [to] release the anger and indignation contained in the play" (Cumming and Supple, "Note", xxiii.) They seem to have taken on board Fo's message in the "Author's Note" to the Richards version: this is a play "born out of classic satirical principles and the deepest roots of comedy, shaped by a master of performance into a modern political farce" (xxiii).

The content of the play was sadly familiar, because Britain had its own farces of power, and therefore the aim had to be to "show Italy through a British filter and so [...] to see both clearly" (xxiv). Foregrounding Fo's belief that theatre is continuous substitution, Cumming and Supple continue: "We trust that any future production will be as free with our version as we were with Fo's original in these areas [topical and linguistic references to Britain in 1990 - M.D.]." (xxiv).

With future shows based on their adaptation in mind, Cumming and Supple add at the end of their script a list of changes made to the script as well as the song adopted at the end of Act 1 during the touring production. The text is very much seen as a fluid product that needs to be adaptable according to a director's and an actor's needs and expectations. At the same time, Cumming and Supple also advocate a stronger reliance on the original text as well as a deeper understanding and the thorough implementation of Fo's intentions. However, in the paratext, the voice of Fo is heard only in quotation and not in a more substantial form, such as an author's foreword. Because Cumming and Supple engage with authorial intentions and their adaptation strategies in the paratext, there are no striking examples of metatextual engagement with these issues of the kind found in Richards's version within the playtext itself. The play starts as it does in Italian, with Bertozzo questioning the Madman (no longer called a Maniac, as in the previous versions). Act 1 is preceded by a short prologue that gives the audience facts about the incident behind the play in a neutral register:

Milan, Italy. Police Headquarters: Some months ago, a man, a self-confessed anarchist, fell from a window on the fourth floor. He was found dead on the pavement below. The police said it was suicide; an enquiry, however, said it was accidental. But we begin on the second floor, in the office of Inspector Bertozzo” (Fo, Accidental Death [Cumming and Supple], 1).

In the 1991 version, one can also note the tendency to let the lead actor take centre stage, a typical characteristic of Fo’s theatre that heavily relies on monologues. Richards, on the other hand, perceived this as an imbalance that he redressed by adding lines for other actors, making the whole play more dialogical.

Ed Emery

Ed Emery’s 1992 translation of Morte accidentale di un anarchico is part of the first volume of Dario Fo’s plays published by Methuen Drama alongside four other plays: Mistero Buffo and One Was Nude and One Wore Tails (also translated by Emery), Trumpets and Raspberries (translated by R. C. McAvoy and A.-M. Giugni) and The Virtuous Burglar (translated by Joe Farrell). The volume was reissued in 1994 and 1997.

The latest edition contains a chronology with the most important dates of Fo’s life up to the Nobel Prize in 1997. In his introduction, series editor Stuart Hood explains the most important figures of Italian popular theatre which are central to Fo’s poetics: Pulcinella and Arlecchino from the Commedia dell’ Arte, the giullari and Zanni (a Venetian clown). Then he moves on to describe in what manner each of the texts chosen for the collection was important in a political and/or theatrical sense. The power of Accidental Death of an Anarchist, Hood argues, derives “from the tension which Fo deliberately sets up between the comedy arising from confusions of identity, always one of the principal elements of farce, and the tragic circumstances surrounding the death of an innocent man."^36

Emery's text is the closest to the published versions of the Italian text. This closeness to the originals might be due to the fact that it was not translated with an immediate staging in sight. In the “Translator’s Note,” Emery explains very briefly his translation strategies: he has maintained all the original references (to Italian political scandals rather than finding equivalents in the UK) and he has also avoided swearwords “which may or may not be characteristic of the constabulary world-wide, but which are not characteristic of Dario Fo.”^37 Emery is aware of the fact that his text might be adapted and updated: “There is by now a tradition with the staging of Fo’s plays: theatre companies take the original texts and adapt the political and cultural references to suit their own circumstances. You are invited to use your own imagination and creativity accordingly” (Emery, “Translator’s Note,” 124.) As a literary translator, Emery sticks as closely to the original as possible: the commissario sportivo, for example, is rendered as Inspector in the sports jacket and all references to Italian place names, legal procedures and other culture-specific elements are kept as in the original. Yet Emery also acknowledges and seems (perhaps rather grudgingly) to advocate the necessity to adapt the drama text into a theatre text.

The paratext in this version of Fo’s play consists of a translator’s note, a translation of Dario Fo’s prologue from the 1973 edition, the postscript by Fo written for the 1974 edition and a page of notes to the translation. As Emery decides to translate every single cultural reference in the play, he needs, of course, to explain who some of the public figures mentioned are and also expand on some locations. However, there are no more than nine endnotes which seems to suggest that an English-speaking audience is able to cope with a literal translation very well. The need to adapt the text, therefore, seems to stem from theatrical practice rather than from a quality innate to the text that renders it incomprehensible to a foreign audience. The publishers at Methuen Drama clearly are aware of this fact: otherwise they would not have commissioned and published yet another, the third, translation of the play in less than fifteen years — and a translation that is faithful in a philological sense.

^37 Ed Emery, “Translator’s Note,” in Dario Fo, Plays: 1, 124.

Emery's "Translator's Note" is only half a page long, briefly mentioning the strategies adopted for the translation: all original references are kept, expletives are avoided and, as usual, closeness to the original is asserted. The translator's self-effacement is evident in the footnotes as well, which are kept short and to the point. The paratextual apparatus is quite short; besides Hood's introduction, which only briefly mentions the historical situation in Italy in the 1960s and 1970s, the readers are not given much socio-historical context. The text, it seems, is deemed to be powerful enough to speak for itself.

Simon Nye

Although Simon Nye's 2003 text is the only version unequivocally set in Britain and therefore a profoundly domesticated text, it is not called an adaptation but a translation. It was first performed at the Donmar Warehouse in London in February 2003 with Rhys Ifans in the role of the Maniac. The plain playtext consists of ninety pages, following a one-page introduction written by an anonymous person. There is no postscript, either. In a departure from the editing practices of the Methuen Drama series up to that point, there is no paratextual apparatus to speak of: on a single page, we find a short paragraph about the play that describes how Fo's "skill at writing farce and his gifts as a clown brilliantly serve his politics" and which also states that "this new translation by playwright and screenwriter Simon Nye is faithful to the Italian version." Interestingly, at the beginning of a new millennium, translation is still presented in terms of faithfulness and equivalence. A very brief biography of Fo mentioning plays that were successfully performed in England is also provided. As pointed out above, neither the paragraph dedicated to the play nor the biography are signed.

The near complete absence of paratextual commentary in the 2003 edition is recouped in the 2005 student edition. However, neither a translator's note nor an author's note of the kind contained in the earlier editions is included in this version. Yet the paratextual corpus is the most considerable in an English-language version to date: about sixty pages of commentary on author, plot, background, difficulty of translation and a further thirteen pages of notes on the text by Joseph Farrell as well as questions for further study. The proliferation of paratext is not surprising: it is clearly motivated by its intended audience, students of drama and world literature classes. While the translation does mirror the Italian original in a way similar to Emery's translation, Simon Nye is also the only Fo translator/adaptor to set the play unequivocally in Britain. As a consequence, Nye drops the name Pisani and renames the journalist Felkin. However, Nye's Englishing is not consistent, as Bertozzo gets to keep his name. The commissario sportivo is simply called Inspector. Also, the bersaglieri in Fo and Emery become the Gurkhas. In these as in many other cases of divergence, Farrell's footnotes prove helpful as they explain Nye's translational choices in relation to the Italian play.

---

As was the case with the Richards version, the paratextual commentary often works in a different direction, providing a complementary perspective to the playtext proper. In the Nye version, the paratextual commentary reminds the reader that this is an originally and deeply Italian text. However, rather than just presenting text and paratext alongside one another, the notes and detailed commentary provided by Farrell engage with the inherent discrepancies between these two types of text and carefully construct a double perspective. This is a first in the translation history of the play. This double perspective, however, is available only to the reader of the student edition. If you sit in a performance of Nye's version of the play or if you read the version published in 2003 that has virtually no commentary at all, the links to an Italian context are weak and diluted (in the first case perhaps necessarily so, as a performance cannot include explanations of the kind provided in the paratext).

In his introduction, Farrell, a professor of Italian at Strathclyde University, uses interviews and theoretical texts by Fo to argue his case. He terms Fo’s style of drama “didactic farce.” Farce makes catharsis impossible, it leaves the spectator or reader with anger alongside a specific, defiant type of laughter. Farrell includes a long section on the situation in Italy in 1969 (over fifteen pages), thus providing the reader with a deeper understanding of the genesis of the Italian text(s) although the translation does not refer to any of these events as it is set in contemporary Britain. Farrell also engages with the particular difficulties in staging works by the Italian playwright:

There are two specific difficulties in the case of Fo: finding a means of communicating to a non-Italian audience the information on political events Fo was able to take for granted with his own audiences, and finding a way of combining his own brand of humour with the political fire. The end product must be stimulating and entertaining for an audience whose cultural expectations are different. (Farrell, “Introduction,” lix)

Farrell also engages with the reasons why Fo seems to need an adaptor more than other foreign playwrights:

An adaptation involves a wider switch, where the adaptor, who in Britain is likely to be different from the translator, makes alterations designed to update, to change setting, to alter the topic of any discussion of satire, to modify character or in some other way to domesticate and make more familiar what is foreign and strange. (lx)

Yet another innovation of the Nye version is Farrell’s overview of the different versions available in the UK (Richards, Cumming and Supple, Emery). According to Farrell, the Richards adaptation “involved a switch of theatrical culture, from an Italian commedia dell’arte style to a messier style based on British music hall. It was not Fo and was more vacuous than the original, but it had a fire, a drive and a comic force of its own” (lxii). Cumming and Supple chose “an imprecise setting, half-Italy and half-England” but then used the play to point out political injustices in Britain.

In his brief discussion of Emery's translation, Farrell implies that Nye's translation is similarly faithful in a philological sense to the Italian versions of the play. The major difference between the two is that Emery sets the play in Italy while Nye sets the play unambiguously in Britain: the bersaglieri become ghurkas, the university of Padua becomes the university of Des Moines, references to Venice and other Italian locations disappear completely or are replaced by English locations (Huddersfield instead of Vibo-Valentia Calabrese). Also, the references to the Inspector's possible involvement with the Nazis are updated: he is now suspected to have been running a mercenary outfit in Bosnia.

The final paragraph of Farrell's extensive commentary to the Nye version is dedicated to the poor reception of Accidental Death in the United States, attributed to "the poor quality of the adaptations and the productions. In all cases, companies have sought to emphasise the comedy at the expense of the politics." In comparison, Farrell states, Nye's version is a "witty and lively translation" (Ixiii).

All of the versions analyzed in this chapter clearly assert their status as a translation or adaptation. Yet, readers still manage to ignore the translated status of works of literature, as the following example shows.

When translated texts are not perceived as such: misreading Fo

Why is it important to stress, in the paratext or elsewhere, the mediated status of translations and to distinguish the different voices that shape a text in translation? Let us have a closer look at a specific case, an essay by a theatre critic on Accidental Death, which fails to reflect on the mediated status of translations.

In a 1990 article published in Modern Drama, Jolynn Wing struggles with exactly the "This isn't Dario Fo" metatextual moment in the Richards adaptation that I have analyzed above, linking it to issues of authority and authorization.

In the process of enactment [...] it becomes clear that more than one notion of author/authority/authorized has been set in motion.
On the one hand, the authority of Dario Fo, the author of the play, is challenged by the very characters he has created (for example, at one point the lone female actor exclaims, “Why is there only one woman’s part in this blasted play?” [p. 41]. Concomitantly, Fo’s ostensible [...] fiction in turn challenges the officially authorized version of Pinelli’s fall. Meanwhile, the authority of theatrical representation itself is subverted by a series of disruptive strategies which persistently undermine the integrity of the performance text.”

As we have seen, the disruptive strategy of invoking Dario Fo’s inadequacy as an author deplored by Wing do not come from Fo himself, but from his English adaptor. The failure to distinguish between the Italian and English versions of the play also lead Wing to claim that a “performance glissage is apparent from the moment Fo appears onstage, in the guise of ‘The Maniac,’ and an actor playing the police inspector, Bertozzo, announces: ‘I ought to warn you that the author of this sick little play, Dario Fo, has the traditional, irrational hatred of the police common to all narrow minded left-wingers’ ” (Wing, “Performance of Power,” 141). Two things become immediately clear: Wing does not have access to the Italian play; and she assumes that translations are exact replica of source texts. While not having access to a text in the original does not constitute a problem per se, failing to acknowledge the translated nature of a text with which one is critically engaging, however, is problematic. If Fo were playing the Maniac, it would be in an Italian version of the play, which would not contain the intervention by Bertozzo that Wing sees as an example of performance glissage. Wing’s inadequate sense of the agents involved in the production of the text leads to an interpretive faux pas.

If academics fail to acknowledge the possibility that what is usually perceived as a single distinctive voice in a literary text may actually be the result of the voices of several agents merging in more or less successful ways, it is perhaps not surprising that general readers very often tend to do the same.

Concluding remarks: Listening out for voices in translation

According to Scuderi and Farrell, critics who have written extensively on Fo, one of the problems with the English Fo is that there is no ‘official’ Fo translator who could give his writings a certain consistency in the target language.\(^1\) It might help to give Fo one voice in English rather than many; yet, as the practice of adapting plays is accepted and widely practiced, and as Fo himself believes in the need to update political theatre, fixing his voice in a uniform published edition of his major works would still only be a philological rather than a theatrical success.

One simple explanation for the many translations and adaptations of a single play such as Accidental Death (with one publisher producing five different versions in several editions in less than three decades!) is that – to put it bluntly – each new production represents an opportunity to reissue this bestselling play. Further, because it is a theatre text and a text by a playwright who advocates artistic freedom, it can reinvent itself on a regular basis in a variety of ways. This reinvention must, however, be justified in a culture which still judges translations in terms of authenticity and faithfulness. There is, as we have seen, a conflict between the adaptor’s freedom given by Fo and the demand for fidelity to the original, a conflict that is quite visible on the paratextual level. My close reading of the paratexts has also shown another issue in this regard: while Fo advocates the adaptor’s freedom in theory, in practice his credo sometimes falters, as his critical position towards some translations and his active involvement in the shaping of others shows.

While the author’s position towards the translations is inconsistent, this may also be true of the publisher. There exists no single editing strategy when it comes to translated plays, not even in the Methuen Drama series. There generally is a varying amount of paratext, yet there does not seem to be a standard procedure for deciding whose voices should be heard in the paratext: those of the author, the translator, the adaptor, literary critics? Within a single publishing house and within a single series there probably should be a clearly defined strategy when it comes to the presentation of texts. Ideally, the aim would be to provide the reader with as rounded a picture as possible by allowing all major agents involved in the production of the text to have their say. An introduction by a specialist in the field that focuses on the genesis of the text and its impact in the original culture is always helpful. So are notes from the adaptors and translators, as they have to engage with translation and adaptation strategies. If, as is accepted practice in the UK and the USA, the playtext appears in conjunction with or after a specific staging, the paratext could also include extracts or a facsimile of the programme (this form of epitext can be used to contextualize a play, as the examples in appendix IV demonstrate.) Ultimately, the author should also be heard, whether in a translation of an original preface or introduction, or – as is the case with the Richards version – in a text specifically written for the translation or adaptation in which an author is given space to comment on the new version of the text.

---

\(^1\) Farrell and Scuderi, Dario Fo. Stage, Text, and Tradition, “Editors’ Preface”, unpaginated page. In an interview with Jim Mulligan in 1999, however, Ed Emery claimed: “I have a stormy relationship with my bosses — Dario and Franca, I mean. Periodically they sack me and cast me into outer darkness, but then we argue and shout, and now I have been appointed their more or less official translator into English.” See http://www.jimmulligan.co.uk/interview/ed-emery-dario-fo-the-devil-in-drag. Last accessed 20 September 2012. However, in the last decade, several other translators have had their fair share in English Fo translations.

The repeated attempts at an English-language Accidental Death make one think of Erika Fischer-Lichte’s remark that acts of translation and adaptation are egotistical because they do not primarily serve the purpose of getting to know another culture but rather reinforce one’s own culture:

> The starting point of intercultural performance is, therefore, not primarily interest in the foreign, the foreign theatre form or foreign culture from which it derives, but rather a wholly specific situation within the own culture or a wholly specific problem originating in the own theatre. The net of relationships which an intercultural performance weaves between the own theatre, own culture, and the foreign theatre traditions and cultures from which it adopts elements, is thus clearly dominated by the ‘familiar.’

---

In the case of Accidental Death, the overall translation and adaptation trend has been one of domestication. Jennifer Lorch has claimed that "it is not possible to produce a version of this play that aims both to be faithful to the author's intentions of the period and to make of it a viable play for the English/American stage, whether fringe or mainstream. The gulf between the two political cultures is too great." (Lorch, "Morte Accidentale," 157)

Farrell argues that "there is the same need with Fo as with other, more obviously "serious" playwrights, to identify the inner vision and to respect that vision as well as the quirks, oddities, idiosyncrasies and comic predilections of the surface" (Farrell, "Variations," 28). However, he also argues that out of Fo's entire œuvre the versions of Accidental Death of an Anarchist have to date been the most successful. The heavily domesticated texts may refer to the plight of airport protesters in Japan or spy-scandals in Britain, but this has prevented it suffering the fate of Uncle Tom's Cabin or Gulliver's Travels, both works that began life as political satires. The international success of that play is a testimony to the theatrical mastery of Fo, to his skill in imagining original theatrical situations and to his expertise in devising structures marrying the extra-theatrical passion to appropriate theatrical techniques, but also to the value of a process which, combining translation and adaptation, conveys all these qualities to other cultures. The result might be, for purists, a variation on a theme, but the music is Fo's. (29)

Some may argue that the case of Fo's political theatre as exemplified by Accidental Death is quite unique; and the play does pose a particular set of problems, as we have seen. However, I contend that the proliferation of voices that is quite visible in the English versions of Fo's play (author, translator, adaptor, academic, editor) is actually the rule rather than the exception in most translations. It may be time for readers, academic and general, to make a conscious effort to acknowledge and differentiate the various voices in (translated) literature, and the distinct strategies these voices advocate.
By way of conclusion: Why investigate cross-cultural acts of reading?

The aim of this dissertation was to develop a model integrating elements of reception studies with rhetorical hermeneutics and polysystem theory, with the object of engaging with cross-cultural acts of reading in a meaningful way and increasing awareness of the negotiations performed by translators, publishers, editors, literary critics and academics. Readers have a tendency to assign the books they read a single, distinctive, 'authentic' voice, blanking out the voices of the agents other than the author that have helped shape a given version of a text. This dissertation reverses that process in an effort to evoke the polyphony excluded by the focus on a single authorial voice.

In the introduction, I argued that in a highly competitive world in which 'international visibility' is often equated with 'translation into English,' a literary work's transnational standing as a work of world literature is fundamentally shaped by how it is presented in its English implementation. It is therefore necessary to investigate the network of agents involved in these processes of cultural transfer, both on a theoretical level as well as in a sample of quite diverse works of world literature in translation. By focussing on politico-cultural agents and factors that shape works of world literature in English translation, I have shown how literary texts undergo a series of transformations even before they reach the reading public in the receiving culture; and I have explored how publishers, reviewers, translators and academics act as gatekeepers, including or excluding works from cultural discourse. The agents' hermeneutical and rhetorical skills influence the way in which they mediate and translate specific texts and larger cultural systems. My study also shows that most readers are still committed – consciously or not– to the Romantic notion of the author and that authenticity is a matter of importance for both general readers and the agents responsible for the presentation and representation of works of literature in translation.

In the three case studies, I have engaged with different agents responsible for the way in which each of the translated texts is presented to and received by the English-speaking readership, as their specific strategies and methods of decision-making and their discursive practices fundamentally influence the standing of a text in the receiving culture. In each case, my focus has been slightly different in order to show the versatility of the model developed in this thesis. As we have seen, the model can be applied either to give a bird’s-eye view of the reception of a literary work over a relatively prolonged period of time (Rabindranath Tagore’s The Home and the World), or to ‘zoom in’ on one particularly revealing aspect of reception, such as the academic criticism on a specific work (Tahar Ben Jelloun’s The Sand Child) or the paratextual and metatextual commentary provided by agents other than the author within the covers of a published text (Dario Fo’s Accidental Death of an Anarchist).

The Western interest in world literature over the last two centuries is crucially connected to the growing number of foreign books in translation made available from the late eighteenth and the early nineteenth centuries onwards. The term ‘world literature’ eludes clear definition, yet – defying all claims to abolish or replace it – it has stayed with us well into the twenty-first century. In this thesis, I have analysed the discursive politics visible in Pascale Casanova’s engagement with ‘world literature’ as representative of theories that advocate the autonomous state of literature. After showing the flaws of a theory that establishes two or three Western cities as the centres of the literary universe (Paris, London, New York) and regards the rest of the world as gravitating towards the centre in an effort to correspond to clearly defined qualities of literary excellence, I have adopted a multi-centred model of literature, polysystem theory. Developed by Itamar Even-Zohar in the 1970s, it allows for several parallel canons and co-existing transnational networks of literary interaction. Rather than a single, unified space that functions according to clearly spelled-out rules, Even-Zohar sees the (literary) world as a polysystem, a conglomerate of different systems that co-exist and constantly interact. Each of these subsystems is structured hierarchically and there is constant movement within the different strata and between adjacent systems as such. This model of literary space is therefore much better equipped to deal with the reality of a transnational network of literary influence as well as with the real workings of the international book.
market and academic engagement with literature. While it cannot be denied that Tagore's success in the Western world and the 1913 Nobel Prize for Literature very much depended on the translation of his works into English, one of the foremost international literary languages even a hundred years ago, one cannot, however, deduce (as Casanova does) that the trend in London is representative of other regions of Europe or other 'Western' countries. Rather, as I have shown, European national literatures can be seen as distinct yet interlinked polysystems that judge Tagore and his works according to values restricted to a given time and place. Thinking of the international literary space as a network of interacting polysystems allows for a more differentiated approach to issues of cultural transfer and literary reputation.

Readers in a given receiving culture share a sphere of experience that, in turn, will influence how they read and interpret a work of literature in translation. There are several co-existing reading communities, more or less clearly defined groups of people who share a common way of approaching literature, linked by similar strategies and methods of decision-making. Such reading communities share interpretive strategies (they read texts in similar ways, using similar tools) and rhetorical strategies (they use arguments that are persuasive in that particular context). Specific members of the reading community invested with discursive and rhetorical authority (writers, translators, editors, publishers, academics and literary critics) will fundamentally shape the manner in which the entire reading group approaches a literary text: they influence the general consensus by deploying specific discursive practices and recur to rhetorical strategies that seem the most plausible to the majority of members of a specific reading community.

The acts of cross-cultural reading which publishers, translators, adaptors, editors, literary critics and academics perform are never disinterested: they are informed by an understanding of literature specific to a given time and place, and inculcated by specific experiences of socialization and education (habitus), and they relate to other works of literature that form the repertoire of individual readers and reading communities alike. Agents are also deeply connected to institutions (publishing houses, universities, theatrical traditions, but also 'schools of thought' within academia); and their acts of reading and rewriting reflect those connections. E. M. Forster and Gyorgy Lukács both are members of distinct reading communities invested with particular discursive and rhetorical power and their scathing reviews of The Home and the World most probably kept many readers from even approaching the text or, alternatively, influenced the manner in which readers who trusted their judgment would approach the text.

Where the discursive and rhetorical power of such agents becomes most evident in this thesis is in my investigation of the reception of Ben Jelloun’s The Sand Child through the lens of English-language criticism. Not only did I discover an overall trend to subsume the novel (and other works by Ben Jelloun) under the heading of postcolonialism, with a special interest in gender issues, but such positioning of the text is clearly linked to the desire and need of academics to position themselves in a way that fits emerging or current trends in scholarship. Similarly, the growing number of retranslations into English of Fo’s Accidental Death of an Anarchist is also best explained by pointing to the particular link that exists between the theatre scene in the United Kingdom and the theatre publisher Methuen, both cultural institutions in their own right. Ultimately, cross-cultural acts of reading are a worthwhile object of investigation because they make visible the temporal and spatial location of all agents involved in shaping works of literature as well as accepted ideas about (world) literature in specific reading communities.

What emerges quite powerfully from an overview of the international book market is that textual interventions from agents other than the author are rarely spoken about in a candid fashion. The reactions to the revelations about Raymond Carver’s strained relationship with his first editor, Gordon Lish, caused by Lish’s editorial practices serve as a striking example of the general unease felt when it comes to discussing how literary texts attain the shape in which they are presented to the readership. Editors and other agents involved in the publishing process will more often than not suggest changes to the text before it is published (although admittedly they will not usually be as fundamental as in the case of Carver’s first collection of short stories): this is common practice and yet it is difficult to accommodate it to our understanding of literature as the 'original,' creative output of a single mind that should not be tampered with.

Lawrence H. Schwartz's investigation of the literary reputation of a now well-known figure of world literature, William Faulkner, engages with the workings of the literary market from a slightly different angle. In this case, it is not so much a question of textual interventions before publication but of how historical and political circumstances can shape the fortune of a writer or a book within a relatively short time span. Schwartz shows that commercial innovations, a shift in critical reception and in literary aesthetics as well as changes in the political agenda after 1945 significantly contributed to a radical change in the way in which the American public (and subsequently, other readerships) viewed Faulkner: from a difficult-to-read, nihilistic writer to distinctly American moralist voice that expressed a new, post-war aesthetic.

The ongoing restoration of Tagore as an important representative of world literature in its English-language implementation is another example of how favourable historical and literary developments as well as personal and institutional interests can result in the redefinition of the standing of an author and his literary output. It was a combination of academic interest in Tagore, India or the Orient (Mary Lago, William Radice, Edward Said and others) and a growing awareness among the general readership due to successful Indian authors writing in English (such as Salman Rushdie and Anita Desai) that helped rekindle the Western interest in Tagore which, in turn, has resulted in a flurry of new translations of Tagore's works (by translators such as Pratima Bowes, William Radice, Ketaki Kushari Dyson and Sujit Mukherjee). Finally, one notices a growing institutional interest in Tagore in the Western world: from the Tagore Centre UK with its head office in London and a branch in Glasgow that has financed and actively encouraged a variety of publications since its foundation in 1985 via the 'Centro Studi Tagore' in Venice established by Mario Rigon (who incidentally has translated dozens of Tagore titles into Italian) to the first Tagore Centre attached to a Western university, ScoTs (The Scottish Centre of Tagore Studies) at Edinburgh Napier University. Most Tagore scholars welcome the positive changes in Tagore’s literary reputation and admit that the increase in English-language translations and critical writing will most likely win the Bengali writer more readers in the future. However, when one takes a closer look at the discourse surrounding translation, another aspect of the readership’s unease with agents other than the author emerges.

We have repeatedly seen translators being blamed for the failure of a particular book or author in a receiving culture. Around 1920, English-speaking readers, academics and general readers alike, were quick to blame Surendranath Tagore for what they perceived to be a ‘faulty’ translation of The Home and the World. Similarly, in order to argue for the legitimate need for a new translation of the novel, the blame is still laid on Surendranath in the paratext of the two latest English translations of the novel (Sen’s for Srishti Publishers and Guha’s for Penguin India). Similarly, each new translation of Dario Fo’s Accidental Death of an Anarchist has claimed in some form or other to be faithful to the original text, or rather to be more faithful to it than its predecessors. Faulting the translator takes place not only when the relation between original and translation is being discussed; it also spills over into the critical apparatus surrounding translated texts. Some literary critics who have access to both the language of the original and the translation express their frustration at the shortcomings of the translation, as we have most strikingly seen in the case of The Sand Child. Translation is still very often presented as being about equivalence between two texts or languages and about faithfulness to an ‘original’ which is often positioned as a priori superior to the translated version of the text. The overall sense seems to be that the practices of editing and translating are actually interfering with what is an authentic, genuine article and therefore automatically result in a loss of quality, a loss of intensity, or a loss of literary specificity.

Thus, there is still a widespread tendency to see the text as a single author’s property and not as the product of an interaction that involves several inputs from different sources (author, editor and/or translator and reader). Bourdieu has called this tendency an “ideology of charisma,” interested in the “apparent producer” of a work of art and not in the agents in the field of cultural production who shape the work of art and legitimize and authorize both the work and the author. Michel Foucault points out that the notion of 'author' coincides with a privileged moment of individualization in human history: the Romantic idea of poetry as the creative, spontaneous and genuine expression of the individual. Tampering with the authentic work of a genius automatically and inevitably reduces the work's value. Even nowadays, quite a large percentage of Western readers seem heirs of Romanticism in as much as they believe that the text reveals (a smaller or larger part of) its author, where 'author' is more often than not understood as the Romantic archetype of the natural genius producing an original, authentic work.

The Greek authentikos translates as 'one acting on one's own authority' and therefore already contains the germ of that individual and individualistic aspect of authorship that shapes the Romantic definition of an author. In the domain of literary translation, consequently, any source text is automatically perceived to be superior to its translation. Also, a translator is not expected to act on his or her own authority, as it is the original that is authoritative in this case. Originals are perceived to be organic entities (the 'real' thing) while translations are manufactured and constructed (the ersatz). The uneasiness about the perceived unauthentic (or less authentic) nature of any translated text usually reinforces the need to reassure the reader of the translation's closeness to the original, understood as philological equivalence and faithfulness to the language and literariness of the original, on a paratextual level. This is the case with the two latest translations of The Home and The World which argue that the text at hand is closer to the Bengali original than Surendranath's translation as well as with Ed Emery's translation of Accidental Death of an Anarchist which implies that a literal translation of the play can actually stand its own ground and that the previous adaptations of Fo's play were driven not so much by textual demands as by theatrical conventions in the receiving culture. While Emery seems to advocate authenticity as closeness to the original, other theatre translators and theatre makers would argue that changing the text into something that the receiving audience can relate to better means creating an 'authentic' experience for the audience.
However, the concern with ‘recuperating’ authenticity does not stop at the discussion of the linguistic equivalence between original and translation; it actually carries over into a second domain of literary criticism, as well. There is a recurring preoccupation with authorial intention: a translation needs to be not only faithful to the ‘words on the page’ of the original; it should also convey the meaning the author intended for the text in the source culture. As we have seen, Joe Farrell argues that Simon Nye’s translation of Fo’s play is faithful to the original in this sense. Nye may well set the play in contemporary England, but it respects Fo’s intentions far more than previous versions of the play that followed different translation and adaptation strategies. Similarly, Penguin India and Srishti Publishers both argue that their translations are more complete, including passages left out in the 1919 translation, and that therefore the authorial intention expressed in the textual choices made for the original Bengali text is for the first time preserved in these retranslations. William Radice, on the other hand, argues that we should respect the authorial intentions behind Tagore’s decision to change the text for a different audience in the 1919 translation. By not retranslating the text, the argument goes, one preserves the authenticity of a new, hybrid text that was never intended to be a word-for-word translation of the Bengali original.

A third kind of engagement with authenticity in the presentation of works in translation has emerged over the course of my study: instances when literary works are presented and dealt with as socio-anthropological documents that provide authentic and reliable information about a given culture. In what looks like a partial reversal of the Western obsession with the Romantic genius, the spontaneous creative outpouring of an individual author makes room for the perception of the author as representing the reality of life in a given (usually non-Western) culture. This has emerged most clearly in my discussion of The Sand Child, which is often taken to represent the reality of Moroccan life (however defined): the assumption is that Ben Jelloun seems to be using literature to critique the political and social reality of Moroccan life. Ben Jelloun’s case is not isolated; it actually points towards a more general trend in postcolonial and gender studies approaches to literature. However, whether this approach is actually doing any favours to so-called emerging literatures is up for discussion: as a result of this ‘documentary’ - approach there seems to be a tendency to emphasize content over form as if these were separable, to the detriment of a fuller discussion of the literary work. The organizing trope of postcolonial studies presents Ben Jelloun’s work as a site of struggle and, when it acknowledges the narrative complexities, very often sees these as strategies in line with the trope of resistance. The different focus of English-language Ben Jelloun criticism (a mostly postcolonial stance with an emphasis on gender issues) and French-language Ben Jelloun criticism (mostly directed at language issues and literariness) lies at the heart of the general lack of cross-fertilization between these two bodies of criticism. The search for ‘authentic’ material that would explain a different culture results in an essentialization of that culture and literary texts end up being perceived as not very different from historical, sociological and ethnographic documents. However, as Wolfgang Riedel points out, there is a danger in equating literary texts with the culture they are thought to represent, as this stance tends to neglect the aesthetic component of literature and therefore fails to acknowledge that literature is in fact a discourse quite different from history, sociology or ethnography. Riedel’s view of the literary text not as a document but rather a commentary on the culture and reality it stems from, written from an aesthetic and reflective distance, is useful in the context of world literature in translation as it allows one to relativize the idea that the main value of such literature consists in its ability to provide privileged knowledge of that culture.

The insistence on authorial intention and authenticity that permeates all three case studies points towards a wider issue. It seems to me that the author or the text (both intended as absolute authority, a locus of authenticity) emerge as demand-driven functions that are foregrounded so that we, as readers, do not have to remind ourselves of the complex processes that shape the books that we read. We have in reality a complex process that involves a variety of craftspeople, politico-cultural agents with specific degrees of rhetorical power: translators, publishers, editors, reviewers, critics and academics. They all shape texts before they reach the reading public and have the power to include or exclude works from cultural discourse once they are published. I am deliberately using the term craftspeople because all of the agents involved in shaping the final product, a book of world literature in translation, are adepts of a specific tradition and invested with a varying degree of authority by virtue of their position within that tradition. It may be time for readers, academic and general, to make a conscious effort to acknowledge and differentiate the various voices in (translated) literature, and the distinct strategies these voices advocate. We should, therefore, systematically think of world literature in translation as a “cultural category produced through institutions and processes” (English, Economy of Prestige, 311).

In the three case studies, world literature has been revealed as a field of forces, an interactive arena where cross-cultural discourse is possible, yet fundamentally shaped by agents whose politico-cultural, especially rhetorical, powers should not be underestimated. Mapping a literary text’s transnational trajectory in light of the changing positions adopted by politico-cultural agents towards that particular text reveals the processual nature of all cultural transfers. The three case studies elucidated here serve as examples of general trends in literary reception and my findings are by no means exhaustive. I think, however, that I have succeeded in showing that by focussing on prominent empirical findings (para- and metatextual elements, epitexts such as interviews, newspaper reviews and academic criticism) we can shed light on the preferred ways in which literature in translation is seen at particular junctures in the history of a receiving culture. Only by considering the agents involved in creating the text and factors that influence the reception of a text are we able to account for both the effect and the affect of literature in translation: the text’s effect on the reader and the affective relationship of text and reader. The model developed here distinguishes itself by its wide applicability: it can serve investigations of a virtually unlimited number of texts in translation. In the future, I intend to develop the model further by applying it to other kinds of literature, such as literature written by women, so-called popular literature and children’s literature in order to investigate the changes in the presentation and representation of literature once we move away from ‘high’ literature written by men and marked as relevant to a specific tradition.
What has emerged overall in this thesis is that, when dealing with works of world literature in translation, we need to take into account a text's transnational trajectory and the changing positions of politico-cultural agents towards that particular text: in short, we need to acknowledge the processual nature of all cultural transfers.

The standing of English as the foremost international academic language is, at least for the time being, an undisputed fact. This predominance may pose a threat of cultural levelling to a hegemonic standard but it may also be an opportunity for those agents involved in shaping 'world literature in English' to work towards a higher degree of what I call worldliness: openness to the world, its literature and opinions about it. As it stands, literary criticism of world literature in English is not particularly worldly. It should, and can, be more worldly but in order to achieve this, more literature and criticism written in languages other than English need to be translated and/or engaged with. It also seems to me that translation needs to be depicted as something adding value (to a receiving culture that does not have access to the work in the original language) rather than an approximation that decreases the value of an original. Let us take as an example influential academic works translated into English: Who can picture what the Anglo-American landscape of academic criticism would look like if Derrida, Bakhtin or Agamben had remained untranslated from French, Russian and Italian? Clearly, these translations have added to, stimulated and changed the receiving culture. They have, in fact, become thoroughly integrated in the intellectual Anglo-American landscape. Yes, there are many more such works that deserve to be translated into English (and other languages). Similarly, how many brilliant works of literature lie undiscovered because they remain untranslated in a publishing reality that allows less and less room for translations? World literature in general, and world literature in its English implementation in particular, can only gain from an increase in translation, both of fictional and non-fictional works.
Appendix I: Summary of The Sand Child

All page numbers refer to the English translation.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Content of narrative</th>
<th>Information about protagonist</th>
<th>Self-reflexive metanarrative elements/strategies deployed by narrators</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Chapter 1: Homme/The Man</td>
<td>Ahmed, now old, lives an isolated life in the family home and writes about his secret(s) in the journal to say that he had “ceased to be” (5).</td>
<td>Presenting storyteller as source of information and necessary presence for true understanding: A.’s journal is described as having “seven gates pierced in a wall” (6) and storyteller promises key to open them.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Storyteller explains that he received Ahmed’s journal when the latter was an elderly man.</td>
<td>Chapter 2: La porte du jeudi/The Thursday Gate</td>
<td>Creating complicity with the audience: “I do not tell stories simply to pass the time. [...] I need to get them out of my body in order to make room for new stories. I need you. I make you part of my undertaking” (8).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A.’s father decision: his eighth child will be a boy. Bribes midwife. The baby, a girl, is presented to the world as Hajji’s son.</td>
<td>The midwife announces A.’s birth thus: “It’s a man, a man, a man” (16).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Father’s ruses at circumcision. A. raised as a boy. Traumatic Hammam experience (being moved from women’s to men’s bath).</td>
<td>A.’s childhood was mainly happy – some minor instances where behaviour is branded male/female and the latter has negative connotations.</td>
<td>Underlining the authenticity of the storyteller’s account: First instance of use of A.’s journal – extensive reading from it.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter 3: La porte du vendredi/The Friday Gate</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Storyteller admits that there are blank pages in the journal so he does not know about certain aspects of A.’s adolescence. Soon he proceeds to reading from the journal again.</td>
<td>A. is traumatized at finding stained sheets in his bed, “imprints of a fact about my body [...]” (30). Relief at not having breasts.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter 4: La porte du samedi/The Saturday Gate</td>
<td>A. chooses to keep up appearances, (growing a moustache, wearing European clothes, getting married): “Father, you’ve made me a man. I must remain one” (35).</td>
<td>Blurring between storyteller and narrator. Readers (not the listeners) addressed directly. Several interpretations are anticipated (disguised as opinions voiced amongst the storyteller’s audience). “Adolescence is a very obscure period [...] that we must imagine, a blank space left for the reader to fill in as he will.” (27). Then the storyteller reclaims authority by reading from A.’s journal again.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Storyteller now describes a 20-year-old A. trying to fit into the role assigned to him: he becomes a petty tyrant to his mother and sisters. Always isolated, A. writes about his misery in his journal and in letters to a (real or imaginary?) friend.</td>
<td></td>
<td>Pleading with the audience to stick with the narrative though it may be strange, creating complicity in not understanding: “I read on your faces embarrassment and anxiety. This confession both enlightens us and distances us. It makes the character even more strange.” (41) Then, the narrator prepares the audience for the “decisive ordeal” in A.’s fate and the story.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Content of narrative</td>
<td>Information about protagonist</td>
<td>Self-reflexive metanarrative elements/strategies deployed by narrators</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>----------------------</td>
<td>------------------------------</td>
<td>---------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter 6: La porte oubliée/The Forgotten Gate</td>
<td>A. behaved strangely when laying down the conditions for his life with Fatima, quoting philosophers and talking to himself: “For a long time now I have laughed at myself and at the other who is now talking to you, whom you think you see and hear. [...] You will have news of me on the exact day of my death. It will be a splendid, sunny day, the day when the bird inside me will sing...” (49).</td>
<td>One storyteller exposing another as fraud but journal (written word) still seen as proof of authenticity “Our storyteller is pretending to read from a book that Ahmed is supposed to have left behind him. That is untrue! Of course the book exists, but it is not that old notebook [...] Bravo! What courage, what deception! I am the one who has Ahmed’s diary [...] I stole it the day after his death. Here it is. It is covered with a newspaper of the time. You can read the date – does it not coincide with that of his death? [...] Listen to me, I belong to this story” (50).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter 7: La porte emmurée/The Walled-up Gate</td>
<td>Fatima’s brother reads from A.’s journal: recollections of A.’s short married life. A. is first relieved that Fatima wants to live like brother and sister. But her presence soon starts to disturb him. In fact, shortly before dying, she reveals that she has known his secret all along: “I am your wife and you are mine… You will be a widower and I… Let’s say that I was a mistake.” (58-9)</td>
<td>First-person narrative, written word is supposed to confer authenticity to the narrative.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter 8: Rebelle à toute demeure/The Houseless Woman</td>
<td>As a reaction to the claim that widowhood was painful for A., a member of the audience tells the story of a warrior-chieftain, Antar, who was actually a woman. Then the plot returns to A. and the journal. A. becomes more isolated, writing in his room. Letters from secret correspondent resume: they annoy and challenge him.</td>
<td>Narrator allows audience to participate but then retakes control of the story. Relies heavily on the journal, but also comments on the written word: “Friends, I close the book here, open up my heart, and appeal to my reason. During that period of retirement, no one saw him.” (66)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter 9: “Bâtir un visage comme on éleve une maison”/“Construct a face as one constructs a house”</td>
<td>The story moves briefly to the other members of the family: the mother is going insane; the sisters want to harm A. in any way possible. Then it is back to the journal entries. A. experiences an orgasm for the first time. “I have lost my body’s language; indeed, I never possessed it. I ought to learn it, starting out by speaking as a woman. [...] This will require a journey.” (72). A. starts speaking about him/herself in the third person female. “Something trembles within me. It must be my soul” (79).</td>
<td>Move from third person narration to first person narration (journal entries).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Content of narrative</td>
<td>Information about protagonist</td>
<td>Self-reflexive metanarrative elements/strategies deployed by narrators</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>----------------------</td>
<td>------------------------------</td>
<td>---------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter 10: Le conteur dévoré par ses phrase/The Storyteller Devoured by His Words</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>This chapter is entirely meta-narrative, discussing the fragmentary nature of all narratives: “The manuscript I wanted to read to you falls to pieces whenever I try to open it and free its words. [...] Fragmentary, it possesses me, obsesses me, and brings me back to you, you who have the patience to wait” (81).</td>
<td>No progress in A.’s story, no new information about the character.</td>
<td>Directly addresses the dwindling audience: “Not many of you have followed me through this man’s story, but the number is not important” (80). The audience/reading public is necessary, however; “Our character is about to get up. We catch a glimpse of him, but he does not see us. He thinks he’s alone. He does not feel spied upon. All the better. Let us listen to his steps, follow his breathing, draw the veil from his tired soul” (82).</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

| Chapter 11: L’homme aux seins de femme/The Man with a Woman’s Breasts | | |
| The storyteller reads from A.’s journal again. | A. decides to “go out. It is time to be born again. I am not actually going to change, but will simply return to myself.” (83) On the journey, A. explores her body in a conscious way for the first time. A. meets Um Abbas and joins her circus. A. is named “Zahra, Amirat Lhob” (princess of love). | For the first time, the entire chapter is in the first person (Ahmed writes down his decision to go on a journey and how he became Zahra). |

| Chapter 12: La femme à la barbe mal rasée/The Woman with the Badly Shaven Beard | | |
| A., or Lalla Zarah, does not seem to mind the circus life and slowly learns how to be a woman. | “Sometimes a man, sometimes a woman, our character was moving toward the reconquest of his being” (96). The ‘Anonymous One’ starts writing letters again. | Narrator points out the fragility of narrative: “The story that I am telling you is an old piece of wrapping paper. It will need only a match, a torch, to confine everything to nothingness” (96). |

| Chapter 13: Une nuit sans issue/A Night Without Escape | | |
| Zahra has recurring nightmares about her parents. Tries to find positive female role model but fails. | Zahra is struggling to redefine her entire life. “I cannot understand the meaning of all this commotion” (102). | The next chapter starts thus: “It is now eight months and twenty-four days since the storyteller disappeared” (103). The storyteller has died, clutching the journal. Therefore “we shall never know the end of this story. Yet a story is written to be told to the end” (104). |

| Chapter 14: Salem | | |
| Salem describes the shock and panic when A.’s family discover upon his death that he was a woman. Then he describes his violent death. | Rumoured to have become a saint after death who grants only male children. Z. died a violent death: knowing that she would be raped again by the circus owner, she placed razor blades between her buttocks, killing him and herself. | Audience satisfaction comes before authenticity: Salem delivers an end to the story but his audience (Amar and Fatuma) are not satisfied: “You’re not going to get out of it like that. [...] I know the end of this story. I found the manuscript the storyteller was reading to us. I shall bring it along tomorrow. I salvaged it from the nurses at the morgue” (111). |
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Chapter 15: Amar</th>
<th>Chapter 16: Fatouma/Fatuma</th>
<th>Chapter 17: Le troubadour aveugle/The Blind Troubadour</th>
<th>Chapter 18: La nuit andalouse/ The Andalusian Night</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Amar agrees with his predecessors that A. left his family home. “He was tempted to go along with the circus adventure, but I believe he did something else” (114). Amar gives us an alternative account of A.’s death, a peaceful, gentle death.</td>
<td>If Fatuma is A., this is how she feels: “I admit that I took great pleasure in listening to the storyteller and then to you: it gave me the privilege of reliving certain stages in my life, twenty years later.” (133)</td>
<td>The Troubadour tells of his encounter with a mysterious woman who shows him an old coin. She proceeds to tell him that he alone is capable of understanding her story. She starts telling him about herself – the Troubadour, however, digresses on how she reminded him of a woman he met 30 years previously. She disappears before she has told her story and now the Troubadour is looking for her (and her story) – she has left signs for him to decipher.</td>
<td>Story of how troubadour ended up in Morocco. Dreams and reality about the Alhambra in Granada mix in the narrative. The audience seems doubtful (silence).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A. escapes from the circus and goes looking for Fatima’s grave. He wanders around, confused and ghostlike–mirrors no longer returning his image. Or has he actually never left his room and all the adventures reported in the journal are hallucinations? A. dies surrounded by religious books.</td>
<td>Completely different ending and interpretation of A.’s story. First person narrative that could be Fatuma’s or Ahmed/Zarah’s. Yet another possible ending: A/Z. is alive and had assisted to the versions of her life story all along? But another storyteller is about to take over and will change A/Z.’s story again.</td>
<td>A./Z. is dressed like a woman and has left Morocco for Argentina where she manages to meet the troubadour, after having falsified letters to him from an old friend in order to be able to meet him (she does not know the friend passed away).</td>
<td>A./Z. appears in the Alhambra episode but it is not clear whether this really happened or whether it is a hallucination. Recites the Arabic alphabet and tries to strangle the troubadour.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Salem and Fatuma look convinced but then Salem tries to justify his own ending. This results in a discussion about differing interpretations between the two men. When Fatuma is asked for her opinion, she complains about the fact that nobody listens to women. In fact, she is the only female storyteller.</td>
<td>Narrating = falsifying: “All you need to know is that I have spent my life falsifying or altering other people’s stories” (134). Aim of book(s): “A book – at least that’s how I see it—is a labyrinth created on purpose to confuse men, with the intention of ruining them and bringing them back to the narrow limits of their ambitions” (140). Creation of suspense: the audience is growing, other people in the café are interested. “Suddenly a man got up and said, ‘You are welcome here. Tell us about this woman who gave you the coin. What did she tell you?’” (145). Deciphering: just as the troubadour sets out to decipher A./Z.’s signs, so the audience must decipher signs.</td>
<td>A./Z. is dressed like a woman and has left Morocco for Argentina where she manages to meet the troubadour, after having falsified letters to him from an old friend in order to be able to meet him (she does not know the friend passed away).</td>
<td>Fact and fiction, memory and dreams are entwined and cannot be separated.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Content of narrative</td>
<td>Information about protagonist</td>
<td>Self-reflexive metanarrative element/strategies deployed by narrators</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------------------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
<td>-------------------------------</td>
<td>---------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Storyteller with blue turban (perhaps first storyteller returning?) admits that his story is in fact the story of Bey Ahmed from Alexandria who lived his life as a man but biologically was a woman and that he thought about “what I could do with this material, and how it could be adapted to our country” (164). The moonlight has erased Bey Ahmed’s diary so it is gone forever.</td>
<td>No new information.</td>
<td>Edifice of narration: “A story is like a house, an old house, with different levels, rooms, corridors, doors, and windows. Locks, cellars, useless spaces. The walls are its memory. Scratch the stone a little, hold your ear to it, and you will heat things! Time gathers together what the day brings and what night disperses. It keeps and holds. Stone is the witness. Each stone is a page of writing, read and crossed out. A story. A house. A book. A desert. A journey” (163).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Appendix II: Untapped resources. A provisional list of French criticism on or relevant to Tahar Ben Jelloun’s The Sand Child

Hollosi, Szonja. "Réinterprétation de l'androgyne, du stéréotype aux métamorphoses dans l'imaginaire maghrébin francophone." In Libres

Appendix III: Stereotyping Italians in English-language productions of Accidental Death of an Anarchist

Appendix IV: Contextualizing Accidental Death.
Examples of epitext

In the early hours of yesterday morning, Giuseppe Pinelli fell to his death from the fourth story of the police headquarters here in Milan. An anarchist railway worker, Pinelli has been ‘helping the police with their enquiries’ since arrested in connection with the bomb massacre of last Friday. A police spokesman said yesterday: ‘The suspect was consumed by guilt, shouted “Anarchy is dead” and threw himself out of the window.’ Pinelli was amongst the four hundred or more left-wing activists picked up in a city-wide swoop in an attempt by the authorities to find the perpetrators of the Milan massacre, the latest in a wave of terrorist bombings that have swept the country this year.

The city is still stunned after last Friday. Anxious groups stand around on street corners discussing. Flags are flying at half-mast. The fundamental humanity of Italians has been deeply shocked.

The fourteen dead, most of them elderly cattle breeders from Lombardy, had a mass funeral on Monday in Milan Cathedral. Prime Minister Senor Mariano Rumor flew from Rome to attend. La Scala has been closed.

More information is emerging about the bombings themselves. The bomb in the Agricultural Bank was a huge charge, something like a stone weight of dynamite in an aluminum container.

The bank was full of rich farmers and dealers settling up the week’s accounts before the last drink with friends when the bank shut.

Those writing cheques at the central table were simply torn to pieces. The clerks around the counters were blown through the wall. A chandelier disintegrated into shrapnel.

Last Saturday night crowds still hung around outside the old palace near the Cathedral which housed the Agricultural Bank. The trusty iron shutters were down. Workmen carried out loads of debris. There was not much to see.

But for the Milanese who stood there bitterly accusing one another’s political leaders of cold-blooded murder, their city has been dealt a scar which will not fade away.

ITALY

There was a growing dissatisfaction within the PCI that the international support on the one hand and the economic assistance on the other could not be of help in arising to the situation. The intervention of the large industrial parties, the economic assistance for the development of the national economy and the selling out to international capital had a negative impact on the country's economy. The PCI was at a crossroads. The party had to choose between continuing its traditional policies or changing them in order to better represent the interests of the working class.

In the early 1970s, the PCI changed its policy and decided to focus on the development of the national economy. This change was not easy, as it meant giving up on some of the party's traditional policies, such as internationalism and the support for the Third World. However, the PCI believed that this was necessary in order to better represent the interests of the working class.

As a result of this change, the PCI became more focused on the domestic issues and less interested in international politics. This led to a decrease in the party's international influence, but it also allowed the PCI to better represent the interests of the working class.

In the end, the PCI's decision to focus on the development of the national economy was successful, as it helped to improve the country's economy and to better represent the interests of the working class. The party's influence on the domestic issues continued to grow, and it became one of the most important political parties in the country. However, the party's influence on international politics continued to decrease, as it was more focused on the domestic issues.
An anarchist thrown out of a police station window: could it happen here?

The British police and prison authorities may not copy the sort of spectacular methods of their Italian counterparts, but the finger of guilt should not least be pointed at them. Between 1973 and 1977 there were 64 suicides in prisons in England and Wales. At the beginning of 1976 the amateur boxer Liddle Towers died in hospital after having received brutal treatment while being arrested and in custody at the local police station. The original verdict of "justifiable homicide" was later changed to one of "death by misadventure". In Northern Ireland Brian Maguire was found hanged in his cell at Castlereagh detention centre last year. It so happens that the cells in Castlereagh are constructed to make it impossible for the prisoners to do damage to themselves: even the sheets are rubber-edged to prevent them from being torn and used as ropes. Perhaps Maguire was the victim of an RUC interrogation technique known as "the throttling technique", a sort of simulated strangulation to make the prisoner talk. On the same date - 10 May 1976 - John MacMahon's body was found in the River Lagan in Belfast. MacMahon having last been seen in RUC custody.

In Britain the most brutal treatment is reserved for prisoners charged in connection with "terrorism". Nearly 90 prisoners in this country have been sentenced for crimes in connection with the war in Northern Ireland. Three names will be remembered: Micheal Gaughan, Frank Stagg and Noel Jenkins. The first two died after being on hunger strike, the third under unexplained circumstances. Micheal Gaughan died on 3 June 1974 while being force fed in Parkhurst prison. An Irish Republican, Gaughan was convicted of stealing £350 from a bank. He went on hunger strike because the Home Secretary, Roy Jenkins, had refused his demands to be recognised as a political prisoner and to be allowed to serve his sentence in Northern Ireland. Gaughan was subjected to the barbaric practice of force-feeding, and he contracted pneumonia after a dry force-feeding tube had punctured his lung. Frank Stagg spent more than three years in a solitary cell before his death on 12 February 1976. On some mornings during his hunger strike a bunch of warders would burst into his tiny cell. Some would lie across his body to hold him down while another would hold Frank's nose in an effort to keep his mouth open to pour a thin gruel down the tube. Noel Jenkins was arrested in connection with the 'Aldershot Bombing' in 1972. The subsequent conviction was a farce. Based on a receipt from an Aldershot shop which the police claimed to have found on him, this evidence was later proved to have come from the pocket of a Detective Chief Constable Smith of the Hampshire CID. On 9 October 1976 Jenkins died in the top security unit at Leicester in unexplained circumstances. His sentence of at least 30 years' was the most blatant fix-up. The prosecution never proved that Jenkins had ever been to Aldershot, and Judge Settig Shaw said that there was no need for them to do so.

Whatever the actual circumstances of the three deaths, there is no doubt who is to blame. Kept in solitary confinement, sentenced to monstrous terms of imprisonment, the British state obviously treated them as political prisoners. Yet the demand for open recognition of this status by the prisoners themselves was met only with increased physical and mental brutality. When prisoners die under these sorts of conditions it is murder.

Great Britain has already been found guilty of torture by the Commission on Human Rights at Strasbourg. It is only a matter of time before prisoners begin to die in H-Block. Long Kesh, where over 300 prisoners are refusing to wear prison uniform or clean out their cells while demanding political prisoner status. The story of Accidental Death of an Anarchist may be more apt to The British Way of Life than many people would like to admit.

247
Works Cited

"Appendix 3: Tagore’s Writings Published from Britain between 1912 and 1941.” In Kundu, Bhattacharya and Sircar, Imagining Tagore: Rabindranath and the British Press (1912-1941), 628-29.

Cairns, Christopher. “Introduction.” In Dario Fo, Accidental Death of an Anarchist [Cumming and Supple], xv-xxi.

Cumming, Alan and Tim Supple. “A Note on the Present Text.” In Dario Fo, Accidental Death of an Anarchist [Cumming and Supple], xxiii-xxiv.

"Commentary." In Dario Fo, Accidental Death of an Anarchist [Nye 2009], xxiii-ixiii.

"Introduction: The Poetics of Dario Fo." In Dario Fo. Stage, Text, and Tradition, 1-19.

“Postscript,” in Accidental Death of an Anarchist [Richards], 76-80.

Rabindranath Tagore und Deutschland, Marbacher Magazin. Marbach am Neckar: Deutsche Schillergesellschaft, 2011.

Lorch, Jennifer. “Morte Accidental in English.” In Farrell and Scuderi, Dario Fo. Stage, Text, and Tradition, 143-60.

Pease, Donald E. "Author." In Lentricchia and McLaughlin, eds. Critical Terms for Literary Study, 105-17.

Taviano, Stefania “Translating Political Theatre: The Case of Dario Fo and Franca Rame.” In Coelsch-Foisner and Klein, Drama Translation and Theatre Practice, 325-40.

Further Internet Resources

Dates accessed provided at first citation in footnotes.

Archive of foreign stagings of Dario Fo’s plays:
http://www.archivio.francarame.it/estero.asp.

Entry “zamindar”:
http://www.britannica.com/EBchecked/topic/655661/zamindar

Epitext 1: Belt & Braces programme page 1
http://www.archivio.francarame.it/scheda.asp?id=013837&start=1&Descrizione=MOAN.

Epitext 2: Belt & Braces programme page 6
http://www.archivio.francarame.it/scheda.asp?id=013837&start=5&Descrizione=MOAN.

Epitext 3. Belt & Braces programme page 7
http://www.archivio.francarame.it/scheda.asp?id=013837&start=6&Descrizione=MOAN.

Forthcoming edition of The Home and World in Spanish:
Interview with Ed Emery:

Memorandum of Understanding between the University of Northampton and the University of Madras:

Memorandum of Understanding between the University of Dhaka and Indiana University:
http://iba-du.edu/index.php/media/index/78

Reception of British and Irish authors in Europe:

Review 1 of Luca Giberti’s staging of Accidental Death:
http://www.dailyinfo.co.uk/reviews/theatre/anarchist2005.htm:

Review 2 of Luca Giberti’s staging of Accidental Death:

Review of staging of Accidental Death in New Jersey, 2011:

Stereotyping Italians 1 (Poster for Richards staging):
http://www.archivio.franccarame.it/scheda.asp?id=013765&start=1&Descrizione=MOAN.

Stereotyping Italians 2 (Poster for Devious Theatre staging):

Stereotyping Italians 3 (Poster for Barn Theatre staging):

Syllabus NYU Florence:
http://www.nyu.edu/content/dam/nyu/globalPrqms/documents/florence/academics/syllabi/V57.9168_V42.9163_V59.9868_Travis.pdf

Tahar Ben Jelloun’s personal website:
http://www.taharbenjelloun.org/index.php?id=3

Trinity College Dublin on Enterprise Ireland Mission to India: